The Senator from Texas has made a statement of fact, and I assure the Senate that I will implement that statement of fact, so far as future action is concerned, in that the same amendment will be offered before this session of Congress adjourns sine die, in an appropriate place in our proceedings, because those of us who are in support of the amendment propose to have a vote on this amendment before the Senate adjourns sine die.

I am sure the senior Senator from Wisconsin knows that I do not have a dearer friend in the Senate than he, because I think it is proper to say that a very close personal relationship exists between the senior Senator from Wisconsin and the senior Senator from Oregon. Therefore, I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin give consideration to the parliamentary situation now confronting us, because the only thing he could gain by pressing for action on his point of order would be a little time; assuming that the Chair is sustained—and I doubt that the Chair will be sustained; but let us assume that he will be sustained. As surely as the Senator from Wisconsin is on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, there will be a vote on the amendment anyway. Therefore, I respectfully suggest that the senior Senator from Wisconsin agree to withdraw his point of order, as the Assistant Parliamentarian has said he can do, if he decides to do so, and that would clear the table, so to speak, and the Senate could proceed to a vote, and stand or fall on the best opinion of the Senate as to the merits of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the senior Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished majority leader and to my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], that I believe exactly as does the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] regarding the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. I oppose the amendment; I think it would be unjust, unfair, and would work hardships upon American agriculture and upon the American economy.

But I must confess that, as the majority leader has said, there is a sort of Golden Rule which should apply, and that those of us who oppose the amendment would strengthen our case by proceeding on the basis of meeting the amendment head on, on its merits.

I have discussed this matter with a number of my colleagues on this side of the aisle who also oppose the amendment. They think that the ruling of the Chair on the point of order in regard to lack of germaneness is not one with which they can agree, for they believe that we should not lose the strength of our opposition to a substantive matter by agreeing that the amendment should be ruled out on a procedural point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator has used the word "phony." I referred to the matter as one of procedure. I wish to state that anyone who raises such a point of order is not doing anything improper, but is perfectly within his parliamentary rights.

I have no better friend than the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]; and there is no more able Member of the Senate than the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BARTLETT]; and I have pointed that out. The Senator from Wisconsin is not only my friend; he is also my counselor from moment to moment and from hour to hour. I do not want anything I have said to be interpreted as a statement to the effect that the Senator from Wisconsin should not have raised the point of order.

But I wanted to point out the intent of the unanimous-consent agreement; and I believe that Senators who are opposed to the amendment would better preserve their position by voting against the amendment, rather than by refusing to permit the Senate to vote on the amendment at this time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the majority leader for yielding to me.

Mr. President, it happens that I am not in accord with this amendment, not because I am unsympathetic with the plight of some ports whose business is going to be affected, but because ever since I voted for the St. Lawrence Seaway program, I have known that adjustments in maritime commerce, such as that now confronting us, would be made necessary by the service rendered by that great waterway.

It was my pleasure, in representing the Senate Appropriations Committee, to attend the dedication of the waterway; and I attended it because I felt all of us were proud of the fact that the waterway had been completed and would be in service to us and to the free world.

As much as I like my distinguished friend, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], I expect to oppose his amendment on its merits, because to take the position that we have constructed this great waterway, but will not use it, particularly when it will be of benefit to both our Government and its economy, would be wrong.

The majority leader is entirely correct in his statement that the reason for the insertion of the provision for the requirement of germaneness in all unanimous-consent agreements is the feeling of some of us, including myself—and frequently we have stated our position on the floor—that if we are going to enter into unanimous-consent agreements to lay aside the customary rules in order to do something constructive in connection with passage of legislation pertaining to other fields, we should have knowledge and assurance that we shall not be confronted with civil rights proposals under a limitation of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield further to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has all time expired? If not, I ask the Senator from Louisiana to yield 3 additional minutes to me, so that I may yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator; and at this time I yield further to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I shall conclude my statement in just a moment.

It seems to me that the ruling of the Chair in sustaining the point of order on germaneness should be overruled by the Senate without reference to its technical correctness so that the Senate may express its sentiments in regard to the amendment itself.

I may say also that I am not entirely sure that the point of order was correctly made, because I note that since the pending unanimous-consent agreement was entered into, the Senate has voted into the bill provisions in regard to title II of the existing law; and anyone who takes time to read title II will find in it several provisions relating to "f.o.b. vessels in U.S. ports," and other provisions relative to shipment of surplus farm products, including, and I quote, "on board vessels in U.S. ports," and so forth.

I think the Senate should face this issue on its merits.

It is for that reason that I hope the Chair's ruling on the point of order will not be sustained—and let me say that I have not only respect but affection for the Presiding Officer [Mr. BARTLETT], who, I know, is relying, as he should, upon the advice of the Assistant Parliamentarian in connection with this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, Mr. President, let me yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have listened to my brethren; and the only admonition I can give is that when we face another situation that is similar we will likewise give it consideration.

I thought the point of order which provided opportunity, in connection with the appeal from the ruling of the Chair, for what I regarded as a very fine exposition of the merits of the issue, would solve the problem.

I have listened to the majority leader and to the other Members of the Senate who have spoken; and, of course, I realize that often legislation is a matter of give and take.

So, Mr. President, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on the question of agreeing to the pending amendment?

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity merely to say that in the 1 minute the Senator from Louisiana has yielded to me, I desire to pay a compliment. I realize that perhaps on a nationalistic basis the Senator could take a very narrow view of this amendment. However, I believe that, instead, he views the amendment on the basis of the broad interest of the entire country when he opposes the amendment.

I believe the basic issue now before the Senate is whether we shall permit eastern ports to charge a toll of approximately 15 to 17 cents a bushel on wheat moving out of this country; or whether we shall not permit that to be done; also, whether we shall treat the St. Lawrence Seaway in the way an automobile was treated 50 years ago—in other words, that it is all right to own one, but do not use it. I believe that nothing could be more shortsighted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, at the outset I should like to make a comment about unanimous-consent agreements. I cannot subscribe to the argument that the inclusion in the unanimous-consent agreements of a provision requiring that amendments be germane to the substance of the bill to which the agreement applies is only the consequence of trying to guard against attempts to include civil rights amendments in such measures.

In my opinion, the principal purpose of the requirement of germaneness is to make certain that, in dealing with an important piece of proposed legislation, debate on such matters will not be limited to one-half an hour or to whatever other period of time is prescribed by the agreement.

The portion of unanimous-consent agreements which requires germaneness is not ad hoc civil rights. Instead, the germaneness provision of such agreements is incorporated in them on the basis of application of the principle that under no circumstances, by means of such unanimous-consent agreements, will Senate debate on so important a subject as civil rights or any other important subject be subject to the one-half hour limitation or other limitation prescribed by the agreement.

I would never subscribe to a consent agreement of that type if it had in mind only the civil rights bill.

Now, getting to the merits of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], and other Senators, I think we are entering into a dangerous field when the United States Congress contemplates declaring what type of transportation shall be used and what ports shall be used by a department of government in transacting the business of the world. I think it is generally conceded that this amendment contemplates making mandatory movement by water and by railroads of the grains of the interior to ports along the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, may we have order? I want to hear the very able argument of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I humbly suggest a question to this Congress: By what authority of the Constitution or of ethics can be it be said that Cleveland shall be excluded as a possible port of shipment, and that Baltimore shall be chosen? By what authority can we in this Congress say that the farmers of the country shall have to pay 15 cents a bushel more in transportation to serve the ports along the Atlantic and the Pacific coast, at the expense of the interior and the American farmer?

Moreover, what answer shall we give to the arguments that the St. Lawrence Seaway should be developed, and that the farmer should be able to compete with the world in the shipment of his products, because of the creation of reasonable rates of transportation, instead of the extravagant rates that they were supposedly required to pay?

I love the Senator from Maryland, but I believe that, in solitude, if he will reflect upon his proposal, he will answer, "Probably the opponents of my measure are right."

The U.S. Congress should not start channelizing where the business shall be, but should allow it to flow on the basis of natural laws, which allow to get the business the type of transportation which is able to deliver the goods at the lowest price, whether it be railroads, transportation companies on the lakes, or those on the Atlantic or Pacific coasts.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Congress adopts a policy of directing the type of transportation that shall be used, does it not also follow that it should adopt a policy that directs how coal, other minerals, and any other type of commodity shall be shipped?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I subscribe completely to that declaration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from California——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute on the bill to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I have previously had two additional requests for time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech I had prepared for delivery on this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR YOUNG OF OHIO

Although the battle for the great St. Lawrence Seaway has been fought and won, its opponents are constantly introducing legislation which would nullify this progressive achievement. The same groups who fought bitterly to prevent its construction are now trying to smother it in its infancy.

We have before us for consideration an amendment which on its face appears to be the soul of innocence, the essence of patriotism. At first glance, it appears to merely state that ships transporting surplus agricultural commodities to foreign countries shall be loaded only at a U.S. port. This sounds harmless enough.

I assert that this harmless-looking amendment is nothing more than a "wolf in sheep's clothing," which for all practical purposes would prevent the shipping of surplus farm products, especially grain, to foreign countries from Great Lakes ports, our fourth seacoast.

I maintain that it is a flagrant attempt of eastern and gulf coast shipping corporations in combination with railroad interests to stifle the flow of trade through our newly created Great Lakes seaports. It would, to their great satisfaction, erase the seaway's natural function as a commercial waterway for grain and other farm products from their great Midwest Farm Belt.

The proponents of this legislation are well aware that large oceangoing vessels cannot move through the seaway when fully loaded with grain. They know that the 27-foot channel does not permit a full ocean cargo.

They are cognizant of the fact that because of this, oceangoing vessels take advantage of as heavy a cargo as the lake route will permit and further along the seaway in Canadian territory, where there are no channel limitations, fill their remaining capacity with American grain previously shipped through the seaway and stored at Canadian ports.

This amendment fools no one. It would forbid this transshipment of U.S. wheat from Canadian ports. The effect would be that the surplus farm products of the Midwest would have to be shipped by rail to the ports of the East and the South.

A recent Department of Agriculture rate study shows that grain shipped via the seaway from 17 States is shipped at an average of 17 cents per bushel less than by other shipping routes. Loss of this saving would cost the American people millions of tax dollars.

It would adversely affect our already hard-pressed farmers. Anything that increases the cost of shipping these commodities can jeopardize this program so vital to them.

Mr. President, the American people did not pay half a billion dollars to build this seaway merely for the use of rowboat and canoe enthusiasts. It was constructed to facilitate and diminish the cost of shipping. The Department of Agriculture study shows that it fulfills both these great expectations.

Now it is proposed that the taxpayers, having paid for a seaway, now should pay extra money to limit its use. That would be like buying a new washer and dryer and then insisting that your wife use a scrub board.

This amendment will create an artificial barrier that will substantially increase the cost of shipping surplus from my own State of Ohio and the entire Midwest.

It is a fact that the proposed amendment will mean more business for railroad interests and fatter profits for shipping corporations on our Atlantic and gulf coasts.

It is also a fact that these profits will be at the expense of not only the American taxpayers and farmers but of the seaway itself. Since the financial stability of the seaway depends on the tolls received, this amendment, if passed, could result in a drastic curtailment of the seaway's income.

I, for one, do not want to see the American taxpayer forced to shell out the increased transportation cost which will result if this amendment passes. I do not like to contemplate the higher transportation costs in the future to the people of the Midwest because of selfish attitudes of certain vested interest groups.

Mr. President, these groups never seem to learn that what benefits all Americans will inevitably be of benefit to them. They never seem to realize that although progressive legislation may bring a temporary setback, in the long run it brings even greater profits.

I was privileged to be a Member of the Congress that passed the original Social Security Act and to have played a part in its passage. Later I served as a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives during which time important amendments to the Social Security Act were considered and passed.

Each time the insurance companies screamed "socialism" and let up a howl of protest that social security meant the ruination of the insurance industry. They repeatedly tried to nullify this great social legislation and oppose any extension of it.

Yet, today any insurance salesman will tell you that social security is his best talking point in selling insurance and that it has been the most vital factor in making Americans more insurance conscious. It has stimulated millions of Americans into buying private insurance to supplement their social security benefits in their retirement programs.

In great part due to the social security legislation it fought so strongly, the insurance industry is more prosperous than ever and constantly growing.

The same story could be told of all progressive social legislation and the vested interest groups who opposed them—FHA, CCC, GI bills, and many others.

Not long ago I had a visit from a savings and loan executive who complained of legislation which has been introduced which would deprive his company of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation benefits. It amused me that this same man violently objected to the FDIC and all progressive banking legislation during the days of the New Deal.

Likewise, Mr. President, the great St. Lawrence Seaway will bring progress and greater prosperity not only to the Great Lakes region but to all America. As the people of the Midwest receive the benefits of this great project they will buy more of the products manufactured in other regions. All will benefit, including the port and rail interests who are unable to see any farther ahead than next year's profit and loss statement.

They are trying now and will try again to use their "Trojan horse" tactics to deprive America of the full benefit of the Seaway.

I urge that this amendment, this latest attempt to covertly destroy the usefulness of the St. Lawrence Seaway, be defeated if Americans are to benefit from the fruits of this forward-looking achievement.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute on the bill to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I had prepared a statement on the pending amendment. Since time is short, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the speech I had intended to deliver.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR YOUNG OF NORTH DAKOTA

The proposed amendment to Public Law 480 would have the effect of prohibiting the transshipments of surplus U.S. grain from Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway. This proposal is just another effort by interests opposed to the St. Lawrence Seaway to keep trade from utilizing that facility. The completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway and its opening should mean freedom to utilize that facility to the maximum extent practicable for the benefit of American industry, including agriculture.

This effort to amend Public Law 480 to prohibit the transshipment of our surplus agricultural commodities moving under provisions of that law and thus from utilizing Canadian ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway would definitely be a step backward. The St. Lawrence Seaway is now in operation and the Congress should not take any steps which would restrict its use to the detriment of American agriculture. Every advantage possible is needed in order to encourage the export of our agricultural surpluses.

The proposed amendment is aimed directly toward restricting the use of the St. Lawrence Seaway to the direct benefit of certain eastern seaboard railroads and ports. Why should we restrict the use of the new Seaway for the special benefit of those certain special interests? They should be willing to compete for the trade without such protective legislation as is proposed.

At the present time surplus grain from American farms can be transported through the St. Lawrence Seaway to European countries at several cents per bushel less than the cost of moving it from the Midwest by rail to the east coast for export to Europe. Therefore, the adoption of the proposed amendment would be at the expense of the American farmer, the taxpayer, or both.

This proposed legislation would mean that we first spend millions of dollars in helping build the St. Lawrence Seaway, and then almost immediately restrict its use in moving surplus farm products and by so doing force the Government to pay higher transportation costs in order to move those surpluses abroad. It would not make much sense.

I am sure if the questions involved in this proposal were well known to Members of this body, it would not be adopted. The proposal sounds simple enough but there is a great deal behind it.

It is not generally known that full ocean cargo loads cannot move through the entire Seaway. In practice the loading of surplus corn, for example, at our lake ports for shipment abroad has to be limited to cargoes of as little as one-half of normal loads. Further along the Seaway, at a Canadian port, it is possible for those ships to be loaded to capacity with U.S. grain stored at that Canadian port. This practice is called "topping off." The grain used in "topping off" the cargo is U.S. grain. It has been previously brought to that port, unloaded and stored at the Canadian port for this particular purpose.

The proposed amendment would prohibit the use of this system in moving surplus agricultural commodities under Public Law 480.

I cannot believe that either the American farmer or the general public would approve of any law which would prohibit this practice and thus cause a greater expense in moving our surpluses.

I urge that this proposed amendment be rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will my beloved friend from California yield 1 minute to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. A finer friend no man could have.

Mr. President, I oppose this amendment.

I oppose this amendment for one simple reason, and yet one that is very profound. It is unfair. It has no place in this legislation or, to my mind, any other.

The Department of Agriculture has prepared a bulletin entitled "Potential Effects of the St. Lawrence Seaway on Costs of Transporting Grains." It is Marketing Research Report No. 319.

On the third page of the report it points out the maximum potential savings as computed in cents per bushel:

On wheat, from Duluth to Rotterdam, 17.23 cents.

From Toledo to Rotterdam, 12.9 cents a bushel.

I say to my colleagues we cannot toss aside these kinds of savings on the basis that we want to help one port as compared to another.

I want the ports of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and all the others to go to their maximum utilization. With this country's ever-expanding economy and prosperity, I think they will.

Combined shipments from beginning of this season—at breaking of ice—up to August 1 on the Great Lakes via the St. Lawrence Seaway totaled 68,656,348 net tons, representing a large increase over last year when 48,342,041 tons moved.

Movement of ore this season up to August 1 was 35,577,842 gross tons, compared with 21,753,390 in 1958.

Movement of bituminous coal this season up to August 1 was 22,246,277 tons, compared with 18,790,458 in 1958.

In July of this year, 2,075,100 net tons of grain were shipped, compared with 1,210,646 tons in July of 1958. This was the third highest total monthly movement in history.

These figures are from a report by the Lake Carriers Association of Cleveland, reported in a release dated August 20 to the New York Times.

This data indicates how extremely important the Great Lakes are as an artery of commerce. For grain, the lakes at last are coming into their own, and a further expansion is probable next year as problems regarding loading facilities, lake traffic patterns, and canal congestion are solved. The lakes will afford an opportunity for grain farmers, as well as soybean producers, to participate in this more economical freight movement.

Grain moving from 17 States through Duluth to Rotterdam is shipped at an average cost of 25 cents per bushel, from 12 to 17 cents per bushel less than by other shipping routes.

Who would be hurt if this amendment were adopted?

First. The American taxpayer would be hurt because of the greater cost of shipping these commodities by other routes.

Second. The American farmers in 17 States would be hurt, since anything that increases the costs of shipping these commodities endangers the program.

Third. The people in the recipient nations, who need this food, would be hurt.

Fourth. The St. Lawrence Seaway would be hurt. It is a self-liquidating project and any lessening of the volume of traffic will make its operations more costly.

Fifth. Our friendly relations with our ally, Canada, who has shared in the cost of the Seaway, would be damaged.

The question of the 50–50 shipments does not really enter here. No change has been made in this law, so 50 percent of the shipments have to move in American ships.

It must not be overlooked that many American Great Lakes carriers are involved in shipping the grain in their smaller boats from Duluth to Montreal, where it is used to top off the loads in the larger ships which were not able to load to capacity in the Seaway. If these foreign oceangoing vessels are prohibited from loading American grain, they will load Canadian grain, possibly at distress space rates, so in effect the United States would be subsidizing the shipment of Canadian grain.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, in the short time I have, I merely wish to say that the Congress should not try to direct the shipment of the farm products of the Middle West into certain channels. I want to mention on thing that has not been mentioned this afternoon, and that is that if the amendment prevails the American farmer in the Middle West will be put at a 13- to 17-cent a bushel disadvantage as compared with the Canadian farmer who happens to live north of the St. Lawrence Seaway. That is an important point to bear in mind.

I sympathize with the Senator from Maryland and the other Senators who are sponsoring the amendment, but let us not hang another millstone on the farmers of the Midwest.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. There is one point in this discussion that has me very much puzzled. I am at a loss to understand why the grain, if this amendment is adopted, cannot be shipped from Duluth, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Chicago, or any other grain port, on the St. Lawrence Seaway. What is there about the amendment that says shipments cannot go to those ports and be loaded? If that is true, I do not see how it is a disadvantage to the wheat farmers of the Midwest.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator from Oregon is right. I think a cursory reading of the amendment will indicate the complete correctness of his statement.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may reply?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It happens that the big storage facilities are on the Canadian side, where American wheat is stored. This amendment would prohibit Public Law 480 wheat from getting the cheaper freight rate made possible by loading out vessels to the maximum.

Mr. MORSE. Would not the amendment be an inducement, which I think is sorely needed, for the development of the American merchant marine and the development of facilities at Duluth, Milwaukee, Cleveland, and elsewhere, so that we could make the wheat available for American ships?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think in time storage facilities will be and should be built on the American side, but at the present time the amendment does have the effect of raising the rates from 13 to 17 cents a bushel. Canadians now have a rate from the prairie Provinces for export trade of 40 percent of ours, because of the crow's-nest provision in their freight rate structure that goes back to 1895. They have not had an increase since that time.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the able Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the point made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon is what I want to stress. Just a reading of this amendment shows all that is required here is that these shipments shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a U.S. port.

That is what we who are interested in this matter have been trying to convince the Secretary of Agriculture of. We have exhausted every effort at the administrative level and have been unable to convince him. It is necessary to legislate on the subject if we are going to protect the U.S. ports and all the people employed in those ports. The end result of the action taken by the Secretary of Agriculture will be to significantly curtail business through our own ports, perhaps even causing some of them to shut down certain facilities and to throw many people out of work, either decreasing the already very small margin of profit under which they operate, or increasing the deficit.

The Public Law 480 program is not designed to aid foreign ports. It is designed only for the relief of hungry people in the lesser developed countries of the world.

We have, in Public Law 480, a unique foreign aid program which seeks to provide assistance on a basis which will benefit the donor nation at the same time it benefits the recipient. If we allow foreign ports to handle the Public Law 480 grain, we are in effect giving away a part of the possible domestic benefits which can accrue under Public Law 480. There certainly is nothing in the law which says domestic benefits should not accrue.

The American shipping industry has already suffered great and irreparable losses as a consequence of expanded foreign competition. This ruling of the Department of Agriculture will only serve to increase the inroads of foreign competition in the vital industry.

I was interested in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], when he said that he loved our friend from Maryland. I love him, too, and I am going to vote with him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield me 1 minute?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish to say that the time which has been allocated in the last few minutes has come out of the time which is to be allocated on the bill by whoever occupies this desk. There are going to be some Senators on the Republican side who will wish to speak with respect to the bill. I do not want to exhaust the capacity of whoever occupies the minority leader's chair to make an allocation of time. However, I yield 1 minute to the able Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am deeply touched by the interest of my fine friend, the Senator from Minnesota, in the future of the port of Philadelphia. I share that interest myself. I also have a deep interest in the port of Erie, Pa. For that reason I shall support the amendment.

The amendment will merely provide that the vast expenditure of capital which has been put into the port of Philadelphia in my State for the purpose of taking grain shipments from railroads and shipping them overseas shall not be totally and completely lost.

I have as much interest in the Great Lakes ports as has my friend from Minnesota in the port of Philadelphia. I should like to see Duluth and every other place prosper, but we can let them wait until they can get ocean shipping into those ports, which they will in due course of time. At that time, if they can compete successfully with the port of Philadelphia for this traffic, I would be happy to have them do so. I see no reason for expediting the arrival of that perhaps unhappy event by providing our friends from Canada a whole lot of business which they would otherwise not get. I hope for that reason the pending agreement will be agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the able junior Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I think a few things ought to be pointed out. This grain originates in the United States. It comes from Toledo, Duluth, or some other area.

It so happens that in the winter the lakes freeze, and there are several months in the year when one can only transport in the salt water level in the St. Lawrence. The grain for the most part is not stored in grain elevators but is stored in oreboats which cannot be used during the winter. The grain is then transshipped during the months of the freeze from these boats to the oceangoing vessels, or the oceangoing vessels are "topped off" when they come through, because they cannot get through the present channels.

The grain starts from an American port. The grain is handled by an American elevator. The grain is loaded in an American boat. It is merely held, because of a navigational problem, the problem of the channels and the problem of the freezing.

I think the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to this amendment because I think it embodies a philosophy which in the long run will do irreparable harm to our free enterprise system.

I want to caution Senators at this moment with reference to another bill which is on the calendar, S. 1789, which is more or less being supported by the wheat growers of this country, which provides, in effect, that because at harvest time the wheat country may have a shortage of wheat-conveying freight cars it is the desire of the Congress to have the people of the East, such as the people of Rhode Island, pay through their railroads an increase in per diem use of freight cars. This is based on the false philosophy that if the eastern railroads are compelled to pay this increase perhaps the men who are in the transportation business in regard to wheat will have more money with which to buy more wheat transporting freight cars.

The only reason why the Senator from Rhode Island rises this afternoon is to point out that this same philosophy is being proposed by the people of the Middle West, who are interested in a cheap transportation system because of their wheat production, which will impose an added burden upon the freight conveyors in the East. I repeat, and experience proves, that the reasoning is unsound. It is a false philosophy that if one raises the per diem on the freight cars in the East accordingly the West will have more freight cars to transport wheat at harvest time. That argument is fallacious.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. PASTORE. I hope we remain consistent, and bear this in mind when S. 1789 comes up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I think it ought to be said about the freight car situation that all we in the West and the Middle West are trying to do is to get back the freight cars which belong to the railroads which operate in our area. It seems that when the freight cars come east of the Mississippi what is done in that part of the country is to keep them. The railroads are willing to pay the per diem rate which has been imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. All we want is the use of the box cars which belong to the roads which operate west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. That will certainly not be done simply by raising the per diem charge.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It will be all right with us if the cars are sent back.

Mr. PASTORE. We will and we do send the cars back, but we should not have to send them back at cost beyond the rate of return that the railroads themselves have set as fair.

If we wish to be logical, we should remain consistent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We have to find some way to get the freight cars back, because they have been used more in the East than in the West.

Mr. NEUBERGER subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that some pertinent telegrams and messages which I received bearing on the Bridges amendment, on which we voted a few moments ago, be included in the RECORD just before the yea-and-nay vote.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,

Reference conversation today relative Public Law 480, specifically S. 1748. We emphatically oppose legislation permitting the loading of surplus grain to vessel at any other than U.S. ports. Earnestly ask your best efforts supporting Kuchel or other amendment restricting such export loading to U.S. seaports only. Reasons: First, believe situation parallels in principle 50–50 law regarding use of U.S.-flag vessels which Congress continues despite heavy foreign interest pressure. Second, believe danger inherent that surplus grain loading at foreign ports can be means to avoid 50–50 law. Third, believe establishment of such principle can ultimately result in diversion of our own grain volumes in whatsover degree to Canadian west coast ports with heavy loss to us; example, last 2 years Portland exported 2 million and 1½ million tons, respectively, grain surplus and other while Columbia River including Portland exported 4¼ million and 3 million tons same years. Consider port earnings of $1.50 per ton conservative and even that figure demonstrates financial considerations at stake. Fourth, principle of S. 1748 without amendment inimical to heavy public investments here in particular and in all other U.S. public seaports. Fifth, we understand Kuchel amendment includes U.S. St. Lawrence Seaway and/or U.S. Great Lakes ports. Kindest personal regards. Same wire to Senator MORSE tonight.

The Honorable RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate,

Understand S. 1748, regarding Public Law 480, pending forthwith. As per previous wires, is grave concern to us and vital to entire grain trade our area. Following additional to economic points in our wire August 27. Columbia River averaged approximately 3½ million tons grain export last 2 years inclusive surplus grains. Estimating 15½ tons per longshoreman-hour average hourly rate per man-hour $3.10 means $700,600 total annual payroll from grain alone to longshoremen and exclusive all other earnings, such as rail and barge freights on grain to tidewater vessel earnings, etc., add at least 10 percent for overtime, etc., and longshore payroll. This item alone approaches $1 million annually. Aside from vicious principle in proposed diversion all economic considerations emphasize urgency your support of Kuchell amendment. Kindest regards.

PENDLETON, OREG., September 3, 1959.
Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.:

Oregon Wheat League position is to support whatever encourages sound movement of the U.S. wheat export. P. & W. is penalized by USDA's programing of 480 wheat from gulf ports, hence anything that improves movement of Midwest wheat improves our position for future exports. P. & W. wheat exports down 30 percent and carryover up 73 percent in past year. Seaway battle is over. Seaway exists and should be used. Topping cargoes at Canadian points necessary to movement of U.S. wheat.

Mr. ROBERTSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in connection with the debate on the Bridges amendment, a letter and telegram which I received pertaining to that provision.

Without objection the letter and telegram were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORFOLK PORT AUTHORITY,
Norfolk, Va., August 24, 1959.
Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBERTSON: Earlier this afternoon I sent you a telegram urging you to support an amendment to the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act (Public Law 480). The proposed amendment to be inserted as a new paragraph, to follow section 2 of the act, reads as follows: "Provided, That shipments of surplus agricultural commodities destined to foreign countries, exported under titles I, II, and III of this Act, shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a United States port. For the purpose of this section 'export vessel' shall mean the ocean vessel transporting the surplus agricultural commodities from the United States port of loading to foreign port of discharge."

We and other port and transportation and grain interests have met with officials of the Department of Agriculture to protest their action of establishing official U.S. grain inspection services at Canadian points. We were not successful.

An amendment to the House bill was defeated by a vote of 142 to 134 last week. The vote was a sectional one—the grain producing States voting against the proposed amendment and the North Atlantic and Gulf States voting for it.

We believe that the establishment of a U.S. grain inspection service at Canadian ports is not warranted by law; that the Department's decision is contrary to the provisions of the U.S. Grain Standards Act; that the decision is inconsistent with the provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1946; and it is damaging to the orderly, historic marketing of U.S. grain.

We have two export grain elevators at Norfolk which have just been expanded. Grain has become an important commodity in Norfolk's port commerce and the diversion of grain from Norfolk through Canadian St. Lawrence Seaway ports would seriously affect the economy of this portion of our port business.

We would greatly appreciate your support of this amendment when it is offered.

Cordially yours,

MICHAEL M. MORA,
General Manager.

NORFOLK, VA.

Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Please see my letter, June 26 regarding exports of Public Law 480 grain and proposal of Department of Agriculture place inspectors at Canadian ports thus permitting exportation this grain direct from those ports. Department issued regulations July 23 placing this arrangement in effect September 1. Advised Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee will hold executive session tomorrow, August 25 to further consider bill S. 1748 to extend the life of Public Law 480. Urgent that such legislation carry amendment providing that agricultural exports under Public Law 480 principally grain shall be delivered directly to the export vessel at a U.S. port. In event such amendment not added by Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee, understand it will be offered from floor of Senate. Virginia State Ports Authority urges your support of amendment to require continued exportation direct from U.S. ports. Exports Public Law 480 grain of great importance to Hampton Roads. Figures released by Department of Agriculture indicate that total exports this grain have amounted to about 45 percent of total grain exports from all Atlantic and gulf U.S. ports. Similar telegram being sent Senator BYRD.

D. H. CLARK,
Executive State Ports Authority.

It is designated "9-4-59—A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new title, as follows:

TITLE IV—DIRECT FOOD DISTRIBUTION PROGRAM AUTHORITY OF SECRETARY

SEC. 401. (a) To provide a more adequate and varied diet to needy persons, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is authorized and directed to receive from the Department of Agriculture surplus agricultural food products and to purchase supplementary foods in addition to surplus agricultural food products for distribution to such persons through the same channels and under the same standards and regulations as are established for the distribution of surplus agricultural food products. The Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of Agriculture regarding the purchase of such supplementary foods to the end that such purchases will have a maximum effect on increasing farm income, insofar as possible within the purposes of this title.

(b) Insofar as it does not conflict with the basic purposes of this title, the Secretary may utilize the purchasing and processing facilities of the Commodity Credit Corporation to reduce costs and prevent duplication of personnel.

(c) Annual expenditures for the purchase of supplementary foods under this section shall not exceed $150 million in any fiscal year.

Assistance to States

SEC. 402. The Secretary is authorized and directed to give financial assistance to State and local governments in meeting the costs of food distribution, including provision for local storage, where such assistance is necessary to extend and expand the program for the distribution of food to needy persons as directed in this title, including the addition of other cities and counties in the program. Such assistance shall be made available in accordance with standards prescribed by the Secretary based upon a formula which shall include consideration of the per capita taxable wealth of the States and local subdivisions thereof, the per capita revenues of the governmental units from whatever source, and the extent of need as represented by the number of needy persons.

Standards of eligibility

SEC. 403. (a) The Secretary is authorized and directed to establish minimum standards of eligibility for participation in the program of food distribution to needy persons. Such minimum standards shall establish the lower limits in terms of income or other resources which an individual or family may have and be eligible for participation. The failure of a State or local subdivision thereof to adhere to such standards shall constitute a bar to participation in this program: Provided, That the right of any State or local subdivision thereof currently participating in this program to continue to do so shall not be denied under any such standards until the appropriate legislative body of such unit of government shall have had reasonable opportunity to adjust standards to those established by the Secretary: And provided further, That no State or local government shall be permitted to participate in this program which denies foods made available under this title to needy persons who are ineligible for reasons of lack of legal residence only.

(b) In establishing minimum standards of eligibility for participation in the program of food distribution for needy persons, the Secretary shall specify that the receipt of income or other assistance under the Social Security or related Acts as well as assistance from State and local governments, as such, shall not be the basis for denying eligibility for surplus foods. Insofar as possible standards for participation should relate only to income currently available to needy persons on a per capita basis.

Transfer of domestic food programs to Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

SEC. 404. (a) Not later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this title, the administration of the direct commodity distribution programs under section 416(3) of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby transferred to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and all functions and activities carried out by the Secretary of Agriculture under such section shall be carried out by the Secretary within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, except as hereafter provided.

(b) Such transfer shall not apply with respect to the donation of food commodities under such section for use in nonprofit school-lunch programs and in nonprofit summer camps for children.

(c) So much of the assets, liabilities, commitments, property, records, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds (including authorizations and allocations for administrative expenses), available or to be made available, for the administration of the program administered under section 416(3) of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, and transferred pursuant to this section, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine relates primarily to the administration of such program shall be transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare at such time or times as the Director shall direct.

Transfers of surplus agricultural food products

SEC. 405. (a) Upon request by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Commodity Credit Corporation shall make available a maximum quantity of surplus agricultural food products acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation. The Commodity Credit Corporation shall upon the request of the Secretary arrange for the processing, enriching, packaging, and delivery to designated points of any food commodity.

(b) The Secretary shall reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for costs incurred by the Corporation in making commodities available under the provisions of this title from funds appropriated for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare pursuant to section 408 of this Act. Such reimbursement shall include all costs incurred by the Corporation in processing, reprocessing, enriching, packaging, handling, and transporting food commodities pursuant to the request of the Secretary, plus the market price of such products at the time such products are requested by the Secretary.

Priority established

SEC. 406. Surplus agricultural food commodities available for sale for foreign currencies under title I of this Act, or for transfer on a grant basis under title II of this Act shall also be made available for distribution under the provisions of this title.

Maintenance of other assistance

SEC. 407. Receipt by any person of benefits under this title shall not be deemed to be income or resources under the provisions of the Social Security Act or any other Federal legislation pertaining to the security of the aged, blind, disabled, dependent children, unemployed, or other similar groups. Any State or local subdivision thereof which decreases the cash or other assistance extended to any person or group as a consequence of the assistance made available under this title shall be ineligible for further participation under such program.

Appropriations

SEC. 408. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of this title.

(b) The term "surplus agricultural food product" means an agricultural commodity acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation under the price support programs or under section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 77), including any food product processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any such commodity.

(c) The term "direct commodity distribution" means the program for the distribution of food commodities transferred to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 404 of this title.

(d) The term "State" includes the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I should like to explain the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield himself?

Mr. HART. I yield myself 7 minutes.

The amendment would establish a domestic food program of some size.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, in order that we may plan our time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HART. I do not anticipate extending my remarks beyond the statement prepared by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. The committee will then have available 15 minutes.

Those of us who are sponsoring this more direct action on the domestic scene by way of an amendment to Public Law 480 have long supported and urged the continuation and expansion of our Public Law 480 program under which our agricultural surpluses can be used to raise the standard of living of our friends and allies. It is an important instrument of policy in our search for world peace and stability. But we cannot ignore our own undernourished and underprivileged citizens while we provide for our friends abroad.

It is a striking paradox that in the midst of overwhelming farm surpluses—so large that they are frequently called our No. 1 problem—there are many areas of the country where poverty and hunger are commonplace.

At the same time we have in storage $6 billion of farm products, we have 17 million citizens who suffer from some form of malnutrition due to insufficient food. We have authorized price support expenditures totaling in excess of $3 billion per year but use only a small fraction of the commodities purchased—less than 3 percent—for food donations to the needy.

The Secretary of Agriculture has broad authority under section 32 of Public Law 320, 74th Congress and sections 407 and 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to purchase food products and to make surplus stocks available to the needy. But this is wholly discretionary and has been sparingly utilized. Last year, despite unemployment which reached a high of 5,437,000 and a condition where the average earnings of 15 percent of our families were below $40 per week, the Secretary used no section 32 funds in the food distribution program.

I have always believed in the concept that our farm abundance is a blessing and not a curse. The amendment I offer is designed to help us use that abundance to eliminate many of the problems of the needy and undernourished families right here at home.

It has six major purposes and effects.

First, it transfers from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare the responsibility for distribution of food to the needy. Repeatedly the Department of Agriculture has asserted a reluctance to use surplus food stocks to feed the hungry. Four years ago Secretary Benson opposed the donation of wheat and corn, in the form of flour and meal, to eligible domestic recipients, on the ground that it could not be justified as an agricultural program. More recently, the Under Secretary reiterated this position when the Department was asked to expand the program for donation of food surpluses in order to alleviate hardship. The Department of Agriculture—perhaps justifiably—takes the position that it is not in the welfare business.

Second, the bill authorizes the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to spend up to $150 million in order to provide a balanced diet to American families in need of this food. The present program is inadequate, unrealistic, and ineffective because it is limited to the distribution of those commodities stored by the Commodity Credit Corporation. The present program assumes that a balanced diet can be prepared from these products.

Earlier this year the distinguished Senators from West Virgnia [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. BYRD] served all of us who were interested a meal consisting of these surplus supplies. Not many were in attendance, and not many would have gone back for seconds.

Even if they were provided in sufficient quantities—and they are not—a diet so limited would soon produce severe malnutrition. With the funds provided by this legislation the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare may purchase such necessary food items as whole milk, butter, eggs, fruits, berries, vegetables, poultry, and other meats. Purchases will be made so as to improve farm income to the fullest extent possible.

Third. The bill authorizes greater use of our farm surpluses for our needy. With the transfer of distribution to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare goes new authority to distribute additional quantities of the farm products in storage.

Fourth. Local welfare agencies will be given limited financial assistance in transporting, storing, and distributing the food. As appears from the record, many communities cannot participate in any food distribution program because they are unable to pay these costs. It is relatively small and should not exceed $500,000 per year, but this is given as the major reason for nonparticipation in the program by local agencies.

Fifth. All costs under this program will be allocated to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, where they belong. The bill deprives the Department of Agriculture of none of its responsibilities for price support or for the acquisition of commodities. Even in the distribution process it must be consulted. But the bill does place primary responsibility for the distribution program in the Health, Education, and Welfare Department, and it does charge the costs to that Department. I believe it is time we recognized that this is not an agricultural program.

The Department of Agriculture has said, in correspondence, that the primary responsibility of the Department is to encourage and carry out farm programs which will benefit the farmers. So the Department is afraid to incur costs which cannot be justified by a charge against the farm program.

Finally, the general emphasis of the program will be shifted to the consumer's side of the picture. Although it will continue to affect our agricultural policies by reducing, to some extent, our food surpluses, its primary purpose will be to eliminate hunger and malnutrition. The Commodity Credit Corporation today is primarily engaged in an effort to minimize its losses. It is, therefore, reluctant to process and donate commodities for which there is any prospective, reimbursable use. This bill would eliminate this as the sole criteria for donation of food.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment for it would be a significant step toward the resolution of the paradox of unused abundance in the presence of great need.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief summary of this amendment be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This amendment provides:

(1) For the distribution of both surplus and supplementary foods by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to needy persons;

(2) For the transfer of the responsibility for distributing commodities to the needy under section 416(3) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1949 from the Secretary of Agriculture to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(3) That the Secretary of Agriculture and the CCC shall make available a maximum quantity of surplus agricultural food products upon request by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(4) For the expenditure of up to $150 million for the purchase of supplementary foods each fiscal year for distribution under the amendment;

(5) That CCC be reimbursed by Health, Education, and Welfare for any costs incurred by CCC in making surplus foods available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the market price at the time of transfer;

(6) For financial assistance to States and local governments in meeting the costs of food distribution, including local storage;

(7) That the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare establish national eligibility standards for the program;

(8) That surplus food commodities shall not be available under titles I and II of Public Law 480 unless the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall have first made them available for distribution under this title; and

(9) For an appropriation authorization of such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes in support of his amendment?

Mr. HART. I am glad to do so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I support the amendment for four reasons. First, I am convinced that the Department of Agriculture has not satisfactorily carried out this primarily welfare function, and that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare should do so.

Second, I am convinced that in my own State of Pennsylvania this is a very important problem, and that the authorization of $150 million a year is needed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Pennsylvania will not proceed until the Senate is in order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, second, I am convinced that the authorization of $150 million for food for the needy is needed, not only in my State but elsewhere. For example, the poultry market is glutted in the East, generally—in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and perhaps in North Carolina, too. The egg market is in bad shape. Why should we not buy these domestic products and feed them to our needy.

The third reason I support the amendment is that it enables the establishment of national standards of eligibility. This, to my way of thinking, is as important to the question of food for the needy as it is to the question of unemployment compensation.

Finally, I am convinced from my own experience as mayor of Philadelphia, and from my knowledge of conditions in other communities of Pennsylvania, that these provisions of the bill will give communities a chance to get started with a program of feeding their needy, which is essential if the program is to be carried out correctly.

At the moment, only four products are being distributed to the needy: Corn meal flour, butterfat, dried milk, and rice. Yet our country has abundant surpluses of many other products which, in my judgment, could well be supplied to needy families who have no adequate income.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement I made before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this subject, which appears beginning on page 109 of the hearings on food distribution programs.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH S. CLARK, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. Chairman, I appear this morning in support of S. 1884 introduced by Senator KENNEDY and cosponsored by 14 other Senators.

This bill, as the chairman knows, includes four main points: Distribution of surplus food to the needy to be transferred from the Department of Agriculture to Health, Education, and Welfare, the welfare nature of the program to be recognized.

This seems to me to be of substantial importance, because at least in my State the experience with the Department of Agriculture has been quite unsatisfactory. This, I think, is rather natural, because the function of the Department of Agriculture is not fundamentally a welfare function. I refrain from a witticism which might be made in view of the present status of our farm program.

Essentially, this distribution of surplus food is a welfare job, it is a job of assisting local and State welfare agencies by providing not only food for the hungry, but administrative assistance for shipping it, storing it, breaking it up into appropriate lots for individual use, and seeing that it gets to the right people. This is not the function of the Department of Agriculture, and I think it is a mistake to leave the program in Agriculture.

The second page or part of S. 1884 is the authorization of $150 million a year for supplemental purchases to broaden the types of food distributed.

First, with respect to the types of food, at the moment only five pretty dreary staples, wheat, cornmeal, rice, dried milk, and butter are being distributed. The distribution of butter, I understand, will cease at the end of June this year. No cheese has been distributed since December. And meat, vegetables, and fruit have been off the list of distribution items for many months. The type of food distributed today is in my judgment entirely inadequate to meet human needs.

And this is unnecessary, because there are available surplus foods in the categories which I have just outlined which, if added to the program, would give a balanced diet and a far better service to the needy.

Now, right now in my State and in New Jersey and elsewhere throughout the East—perhaps in North Carolina, too—the poultry market is glutted, and the egg market is in bad shape.

This, I think, would be a particularly good field in which such purchases should be made. At the moment, only surpluses obtained through price support programs are available. And this $150 million would, if appropriated, service a double purpose. It would help the hard-pressed poultry industry and egg industry, and it would put food into the mouths of the hungry. It seems to me an incredible situation in which hundreds of millions of dollars of food, indeed—5 billions of dollars are being shipped overseas pursuant to Public Law 480, while hungry people in America are not given access to surpluses of farm products right here in our own country.

I hasten to add that I support Public Law 480, I think it is right, just as I support mutual security and foreign aid—but it does seem to me that this administration has had a very blind spot in ignoring the needs of our American citizens while being very zestful, very alert, in feeding the hungry overseas. And I am happy they are helping to feed the hungry overseas.

Now, you may ask why $150 million. And to some extent that figure is lowered by reason of the current "budgetitis" which inevitably, like poison ivy, has spread over most of the body politic. And yet I think we need to be practical. With the White House's present position toward the budget, some of the more extravagant bills which have been suggested to this committee, and which were so virulently attacked by the administration in the paper this morning, bills which the administration says would cost $2½ billion, obviously would not be approved in the White House if Congress passed them.

On the other hand, if this program is to be meaningful, there has to be a sufficient appropriation, and there has to be a sufficient authorization to really put some food in the mouths of the hungry and not just to make a gesture which will look good on paper but won't cut out the hunger.

I think Senator KENNEDY and my other colleagues have come to a sensible middle ground in fixing the figure at $150 million. There is no imagination in that figure. But in the light of the psychological condition about the budget—I might say also the psychopathic condition about the budget which now affects us—I would say that that is a figure which we could sustain and which it would be very difficult for the President in good conscience to veto.

The third main point in the Kennedy bill, S. 1884, is to empower HEW to establish minimum or maximum standards of eligibility. And that, I think, is desirable, perhaps because I am one of those who think that we live in a national economy in which it makes no difference whether a person is hungry in Arizona or North Carolina or Pennsylvania or Maine, he is still an American citizen, and that national standards of eligibility are a wise thing to set forth within very broad limits with adequate flexibility to State and local agencies to move within those standards to fulfill the needs of their particular community.

I find an analogy in this situation and that in the unemployment compensation picture, where I have been one of those with Senator KENNEDY who has long urged the establishment of national standards for unemployment compensation. I think the same arguments apply here.

The fourth major purpose in the Kennedy bill is to give assistance to local agencies in transporting, storing and distributing food. And this, I think, is of the greatest importance. When I was mayor of Philadelphia we had great trouble in establishing an adequate surplus food distribution program because we couldn't get the assistance from the Federal Government which we needed in transporting, warehousing, and distributing surplus food. This, I think, was in part due to the quite natural tendency of the Department of Agriculture to look on this program from a welfare angle on a practical basis.

There have been many counties in the Commonwealth which have had great difficulty in setting up surplus food programs which were sensible and adequate because of the inadequacies of the provisions in the Federal law dealing with transportation, storage, and distribution.

We are fortunate in having here before the committee today Mr. Fred Klunk, deputy secretary of the Department of Property and Supplies of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, who is an expert in this field, and will call to the attention of the members of the committee the problems which confront him as a State administrator in dealing both with the Federal Government and with the local agencies.

He will make some specific suggestions as to how the Kennedy bill could perhaps be improved in dealing with this particular point. And I should like to endorse the views which he has made available to me before he presents them to the committee, at least in general. I am sure the committee will give careful consideration to Mr. Klunk's testimony.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to state why we in Pennsylvania feel so strongly about this measure. Our Commonwealth, I think, at the moment has the largest number of surplus labor markets of any State in the country. We are affected, in fact inflicted, with chronic and persistent unemployment. Chronic and persistent unemployment inevitably brings hunger in its course. There are presently 800,000 people in Pennsylvania who are dependent on surplus food to keep alive. In some of our counties, which include these depressed areas, as many as one out of every three residents is receiving this form of assistance.

At the moment there are 914,412 persons eligible in Pennsylvania for surplus food as of the end of April.

This is a marked falloff from the winter's high figures of the month before. Well, I am hopeful that the peak of unemployment is passed and the conditions will improve. I think we ought to take out a little insurance not only for the 914,000 people presently eligible, but for the many hundreds of thousands more who have been eligible in the immediate past and many well be again.

In March, for example, there were 940,000 eligibles in Pennsylvania. In April, there were 780,770 recipients, which is 7 percent of the State's population of slightly over 11 million individuals. The figure in March was 858,000 or over 8 percent. A year ago it was far higher.

During the last steel strike—and another is threatened—almost 1,500,000 people in Pennsylvania were receiving surplus food. They may be on that surplus food program or eligible for it again within the next 30 days.

Pennsylvania receives almost twice as much under this program as any other State, and includes about 15 percent of the Nation's 5,277,000 recipients.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge that your subcommittee make a favorable report on S. 1884.

May I thank you again for your courtesy in giving me this opportunity to appear before the subcommittee.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Senator from Michigan if he will be kind enough to explain the paragraph at the end of the paragraph (a) of section 403, which reads:

And provided further, That no State or local government shall be permitted to participate in this program which denies foods made available under this title to needy persons who are ineligible for reasons of lack of legal residence only.

I am wondering whether under this program a person could move into one State, and on the day after his arrival participate in the program; move to another State on the following day and participate again; and keep traveling around the country and obtaining this food. This strikes me as being a rather loose provision. I have great concern about it. I should appreciate having the Senator explain it.

Mr. HART. If I thought the cost of traveling would be less than the cost of food, I would worry about that question, too. I think this provision is merely a safeguard so that a State could not use this method alone without reference to a prior history of approval. If a State welfare director saw such a practice was growing, it might be that he would deny such participation, but not for the lack of legal residence alone.

Mr. SCOTT. How can we be certain that the allocations and quotas provided in the amendment have any true relationship to the population of a State, if it is not necessary for a person to be a legal resident of the State in order to participate under the plan proposed in the amendment?

Mr. HART. I am not familiar with the requirements of Pennsylvania law at present, but I do know that in a great many States this requirement is included. There is no directive to the welfare director that he shall say to a hungry man: "I am sorry, but you will have to go back to Tennessee." I think that is perfectly clear.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. Is it not true that there are many States where there is a limitation or condition as to residence operating before a person can avail himself of the benefits, for lack of a better word, under the public assistance program, and that this proposal is made in order to overcome that obstacle—that delay—with reference to the food. That is the purpose of the insertion of this provision in the bill, is it not?

Mr. HART. Yes. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have been studying the amendment. I consider it to be very laudatory in its objective. But I note with interest that only $150 million will be permitted to be spent under the authority to be granted, while we give to all the 50 States the right to provide not only warehousing but also to assist the States in the participation of the distribution of the commodities, as well as going on the open market and buying other commodities which are not in surplus.

I ask the Senator from Michigan if this matter, which deals with the creation of rather large establishments within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, has ever been referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, which has jurisdiction of that Department?

Mr. HART. It is my impression that the Senator from Oklahoma has asked two questions. An assumption is implicit in the second question.

I point out that the $150 million is to enable the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to purchase goods not in CCC stock. This would not be the full scope of distribution. Second, this proposal, in varying form, was presented to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is the chairman, but without success, I might add. To me, the persuasiveness of the proposal is that it would take a program which basically is a welfare program and put it in the department which I think would demonstrate much more sympathy toward it than the Department of Agriculture. I think that may be our problem in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. We are concerned with insuring against anything being built into the farm program which would make it more difficult to sell the farm program per se. I feel that by removing it from the Department of Agriculture and placing it in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare we will have a truer perspective of the problem.

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that it should properly be placed in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. But what worries me is that no testimony has been taken or no consideration given to a vast new program which should be started on its way in a proper, correct, and well-studied manner. It has not been taken before the Senate body which is charged with the consideration of legislation affecting the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. I have conferred with the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and he tells me he is not aware of this proposal ever coming before his committee. Yet it would be his committee which would have to check on the administration of the program.

Mr. HART. The Senator from Oklahoma is correct. The matter should be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. While this proposal has not formally been referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, on which I serve, and my statement may not be a complete answer to this question, if the Senator will look at the amendment, he will see that it is sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Welfare of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; by myself, and by Senators MCNAMARA, RANDOLPH, MANSFIELD, MORSE, BYRD of West Virginia, MURRAY, MCCARTHY, YARBOROUGH, and MCGEE.

Mr. MONRONEY. The point I am trying to make——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. What I should like to ask is whether any testimony about the amendment has been adduced. I have the greatest respect for the objectives of the sponsors of this amendment, but it calls for a program of great magnitude.

Although I would be inclined to support the amendment if it had been properly considered, and if sufficient testimony regarding it had been taken, and if, perhaps, corrections had been made in the amendment, following such hearings, instead of having the amendment come before us without having been the subject of hearings on the part of the committee which must finally have jurisdiction of it——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. A voluminous letter in opposition to the amendment was directed to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. So I have no doubt that that Department and the administration are opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may speak for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I would assume that this amendment was drawn prior to the drafting of the amendment which provides for the food stamp plan, which a short time ago was acted on by the Senate.

Mr. HART. No, I do not think so. It is my understanding that this amendment, in bill form, was included in a series of perhaps six or eight bills on which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry held hearings, and that this bill was not favorably reported.

Mr. PASTORE. Do I correctly understand that the chairman of the committee will explain that point?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. PASTORE. Very well, I await his explanation.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, in answer to the question which was asked by the Senator from Rhode Island, I wish to state that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry held hearings on a bill similar to the pending amendment. As a result of those hearings, the committee approved the food stamp plan which already has been adopted by the Senate. The committee objected to the proposal offered by the Senator from Michigan, but approved the food stamp plan.

Mr. PASTORE. Do I correctly understand that the objective of the food stamp plan is more or less similar to the objective of the pending amendment, with the exception of not being so broad in scale?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes, I think so.

Mr. PASTORE. In other words, this amendment would result in a duplication, would it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; it would overlap the provision which the Senate already has included in the bill.

This amendment, Mr. President, is most far-reaching. It would vest the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare with authority over a broad food distribution program. Not only would surplus foods be used in order to carry out the provisions of the amendment, but the Congress would have to appropriate up to $150 million a year in order to purchase supplementary foods to carry out the program. Such purchases would be in addition to surplus foods now on hand, which also would be utilized in order to carry out the program.

The amendment also includes authorization for funds to administer the program at the National and the State levels. The appropriation of funds would be authorized in order to store some of the commodities wherever they would be used.

I say that a measure of this character should certainly not be considered by the Senate without more hearings and study than has been given it thus far.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be rejected.

At this time I yield 3 minutes to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. First, Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for 1 minute.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Do I correctly understand that the bill contains no limitation whatsoever on the amount which is to be expended?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; insofar as surplus agricultural commodities are concerned.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. There is a $150 million limitation on the amount for supplementary foods, is there not?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But not as regards surplus foods. So far as surplus foods are concerned, the bill is absolutely unlimited, and we do not know anything about what the amount would be; is that correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the House bill already contains a provision for a food stamp program, with a limitation of $1 billion. The Senate bill contains a more restricted provision for the food allotment plan, and in that connection provision is made for a maximum time and a maximum amount.

The Senate should not agree to the pending amendment, even though it contains several good provisions. We cannot afford at this time to divide the responsibility for carrying on surplus food activities. Certainly we do not want to create duplicating services; in other words, we do not want to provide for a cotton administration, a wheat administration, and various other administrations of that sort.

In addition, the proposed period of time in which the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare would be directed to establish so elaborate a system is certainly insufficient, even if the amendment were all right otherwise.

I believe the Congress has already provided for sufficient programs of this sort—both through the action taken by the House of Representatives and the action taken by the Senate—to fulfill our needs for this year.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, unless other Senators wish me to yield time to them, I now yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time on the amendment has been yielded back.

Mr. MORSE subsequently said: Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the amendment just defeated, I ask unanimous consent that my testimony, with supporting letters, given before the committee at the time the proposal was before the committee, be printed in the RECORD immediately before the rollcall on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT FILED BY HON. WAYNE MORSE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OREGON

Mr. Chairman, it is with great pleasure that I testify today in support of S. 1844, the Food Distribution Act of 1959. I am a cosponsor of the bill and I support it because in my judgment, it will provide for a workable plan to meet human needs here at home in a manner that is more effective than the operation at present of our surplus foods program.

Since the bill would transfer the jurisdiction over a portion of the surplus food program from the Department of Agriculture and vest it in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, one can expect that it will be received coolly by the Department of Agriculture. This is understandable. However, in terms of the human needs that exist, I feel we have a duty to take such action as will assure that the bountiful production of our farms is placed within reach of those low-income families who can, with profit to their health and welfare, make good use of it. Certainly members of families receiving public assistance are among the first who should be enabled to get surplus food stocks.

Recent hearings on the problems of hungry children in the District of Columbia have convinced me that need for food exists in this large city and a similar situation probably prevails in hundreds, possibly thousands of communities elsewhere in the Nation.

In the elementary grade school age group alone, according to a letter received from the Director of the Department of Public Welfare on May 27, 1959, in Washington there are estimated to be 10,500 children now receiving surplus foods consisting of cornmeal, dried milk, flour, rice, and butter. I am informed that cheese is no longer available but that it is hoped that powdered eggs will be added starting in July.

When it is realized that here in the District an estimated 10,650 families with 34,000 children exist at or below the very low public assistance standard of income, the problem begins to assume its proper magnitude. Philip Stoddard Brown in his column in the Washington Post of May 25, 1959, revealed 70,000 men, women, and children, about one in 12 of the District residents, simply, to use his own words "do not have income to buy as much food, clothing, and other essentials as is provided relief recipients under the standards now in effect." This is a shocking situation which should be rectified. S. 1844 provides a procedure which will permit us to take the steps to correct the situation.

I have spoken about the District, but the problem is not confined to the District. I have had inquiries from the public assistance authorities in Klamath Falls, Oreg., as to how they might participate in the program. With your permission Mr. Chairman, I shall incorporate at this point in my statement, copies of correspondence with the Department relative to the problem raised by Mr. Metler of Klamath Falls, Oreg., and the departmental replies to him and to Miss Jeanne Jewett, State administrator of public welfare of Oregon.

The reorganization of function which would follow upon enactment of S. 1844 should prove most healthy. The U.S. Department of Agriculture would be relieved of a task to which it is not particularly adapted and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare would be given a responsibility which falls within its scope of operation. The ultimate gainers, it appears to me of this reorganization, would be the destitute whose needs could be met more quickly, and the farmers who would be assured that their work was relieving human misery and hunger instead of being stored in sterile surplus bins.

I urge that serious consideration be given by the subcommittee to the measure and that it be reported favorably from the full committee at an early date.

KLAMATH FALLS, OREG., April 1, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I am writing you at this time with regard to surplus food items that might possibly be made available to the welfare department in our county and also other counties within our State. I am serving as a member of the Klamath County Welfare Commission and firmly believe that if we can obtain certain items for our welfare recipients that no doubt it will give them a better standard of living. We also believe that there are many of the old-age pension recipients and seasonal workers who are residents of this area who are not eligible for benefits under the welfare regulations and code and that these people need help in a like manner.

I would appreciate any information that you may be able to give us as quickly as possible that may enable us to carry out a program to bring about better living conditions for our people and your people in other counties in the State of Oregon.

Yours very truly,

METLER BROS.,
EVERETT E. METLER.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
Washington, D.C. May 7, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Thank you for your letter of April 24, with enclosures.

The Food Distribution Division has written directly to Mr. Everett E. Metler of Klamath Falls, as you requested, giving him information about the present availability of surplus foods for welfare distribution, and telling him how Klamath County may participiate in the program.

A copy of this letter was sent to Miss Jeanne Jewett, of Portland.

We are enclosing copies of the letters to Mr. Metler and Miss Jewett, as well as the pamphlet mentioned in the correspondence.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE L. MILLER,
Assistant Secretary.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL MARKETING SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., May 1, 1959.

Mr. EVERETT E. METLER,
METLER BROS.,
Klamath Falls, Oreg.

DEAR MR. METLER: The Honorable Wayne Morse, U.S. Senator from Orgeon, has asked us to write you in connection with your recent inquiry about the availability of surplus foods for distribution to needy families in Klamath County.

The surplus food items now in Federal inventory and available for donation to authodized State agencies for distribution to needy families and individuals, whom State and local public welfare agencies have certified to be in need of food assistance, are butter, nonfat dry milk, rice, wheat flour and cornmeal.

As you indicated in your letter to Senator MORSE, no surplus distribution program for needy families has been authorized yet in your State. Participation in this program is voluntary, with each State having the prerogative of inaugurating a welfare distribution program, or not, according to its own desires and judgment. The Department of Finance and Administration, which now distributes federally donated foods to nonprofit charitable institutions, such as hospitals, homes for the aged, child-care centers, orphanages, and summer camps for children, recently indicated to our area office in San Francisco that the welfare distribution program will not be started any time soon, due to general economic recovery in the State.

County and other local public welfare agencies wishing to participate in the surplus food program must make appropriate arrangements with the intended or authorized State distributing agency which, in this instance, will be the Department of Finance and Administration. For current information on this situation, you may write to Mr. Wakefield B. Walker, Chief, Surplus Property Section, 1965 Taft Street, in Salem. If the State Welfare Commission or the Governor decides to inaugurate the program, and surplus foods are requested for this purpose, the U.S. Department of Agriculture will be glad to donate available surplus products and ship them free to the State distributing agency.

We are enclosing a pamphlet about the distribution of surplus foods to eligible outlets, including needy families, which will give you additional informaton about the Department's surplus dsposal programs.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD P. DAVIS,
Deputy Director,
Food Distribution Division.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL MARKETING SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., May 1, 1959.

Miss JEANNE JEWETT,
State Administrator,
Portland, Oreg.

DEAR MISS JEWETT: We are enclosing a copy of our letter to Mr. Everett E. Metler, a member of the Klamath County Welfare Commission.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE, U.S. Senator from Oregon, requested us to write Mr. Metler in reply to his inquiry about the availability of federally donated surplus foods for distribution to needy families in Klamath County and elsewhere in your State. Senator MORSE suggested that we might wish to write you also about surplus foods, in the event that you may be interested in a similar way about this matter.

We have indicated to Mr. Metler the surplus food items which are currently available for distribution in domestic welfare programs, and explained how local public welfare agencies may receive surplus foods for that purpose.

A copy of the pamphlet, which we mentioned in the final paragraph of our letter to Mr. Metler, is enclosed for further clarification of the Department's surplus disposal programs.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD P. DAVIS,
Deputy Director,
Food Distribution Division.

So the amendment offered by Mr. HART for Mr. KENNEDY and other Senators was rejected.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair), laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 435) declaring that the Congress does hereby express its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role that labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "9–1–59—G."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the proper place in the bill, to insert the following:

( ) Section 104(g) (relating to loans for promotion of multilateral trade and economic development) is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a period and the following: "Foreign currencies received in repayment of the principal or payment of interest on such loans shall be available, either through direct expenditure or through investment and use of the proceeds, for grants or loans in accordance with this section and without regard to the provisions of Public Law 213, Eighty-second Congress, to any jointly controlled nonprofit foundation established in a friendly foreign country pursuant to agreement between the United States and such country for the purpose of fostering and promoting research, education, health, and public welfare".

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] whatever time he desires.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I was a cosponsor with the Senator from Minnesota of the amendment at the time it was discussed in the committee. It was not rejected in the committee, but we simply did not get to the amendment in the committee proceedings.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It should be noted, with regard to the amendment, that it is cosponsored by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I suggest, on page 2, that we strike the word "and," the next to the last word on line 4, and on line 5 add the following after the word "welfare:" "and mutual good will and understanding."

I should like to state my reasons for this suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose that as an amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I accept the modification, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota accepts the modification to the amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator. My reason is very ample. This amendment deals with what is known as the binational centers. Those who have traveled in other countries where there are these centers are familiar with them. In my opinion, this is one of the most constructive outgrowths of the Smith-Mundt program. In these communities a group of Americans living abroad and indigenous people living abroad meet together in a hall, a bi-national center. In some places, by joint effort, they have constructed little buildings. Here they study the English language or study the various educational, health, public welfare, and research aspects of the country.

To that we would add the creation of good will and mutual understanding.

During the Easter recess I visited one of these centers at Bogotá, Colombia. The Colombians have become so enhanced with this very fine concept that they have created, with the use of their own funds, little buildings for these centers. They have the flags of Colombia and of the United States crisscrossed at the entrance. They show little motion pictures about America.

There are few places in all the world where we can spend these counterpart funds more effectively than in the cementing of relationships between this country and the recipient countries.

It seems to me this is one amendment we should agree to unanimously. It would not add an iota to the cost; it would simply make available this additional end use of money received from Public Law 480 operations.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to express my support of the amendment, Mr. President. Food can be an extremely important item with respect to enabling countries which are not industrialized to industrialize, both by taking people off the land and, for the moment, using them as the Communists do, by reducing the standard of living in order to bring about industrialization through reduction of consumption, or, as we propose, by giving the people the margin of food which they need.

I think in the same spirit the philosophy of the people and their understanding of what they are working for, and why, would be contributed to by adoption of the amendment, which would give the ideological background for food for peace, which I like, and for which I voted. I hope very much the Senate will see fit to agree to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, this amendment has been concisely and accurately described and reported by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. It relates to programs which he and our distinguished former colleague from New Jersey, Mr. Smith, were able to get authorized by the Congress some years ago.

This would not add a single dime to the cost. The program is based upon the funds which are repaid from loans, either principal or interest. The argument that there is not enough of counterpart funds to go around falls of its own weight. This program would be financed from the repayment schedules, from interest repayments and principal repayments.

Furthermore, though time does not permit me to go into this matter completely, I have a study of the currencies which are going to be available under this program, and I wish to say that unless something such as the Binational Foundation is established to promote the particular enterprises we have listed, we are going to find ourselves in a very serious and embarrassing situation in many countries.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this amendment will make possible some constructive action in Poland, for example, where one can spend the zlotys no place except in Poland, and one can do literally nothing with them except under a binational foundation.

It seems to me we have an opportunity to do as the Senator from South Dakota says, to build mutual good will and understanding, to promote a program of education, research, health and public welfare. I hope the Senate will see fit to approve the amendment as a very desirable addition to existing policies.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

This is an effort to spend the repayments in loans made from proceeds of sales of surplus commodities, as those repayments are collected. This money could certainly be used by the United States to pay some of our own bills within the countries where the food is sold and the currencies collected.

Mr. President, the language of the proposal is so broad "fostering and promoting research, education, health, and public welfare"—as to make the scope of operation of such foundations as are proposed to be authorized practically unlimited. To take an extreme example, it would be within the legislative language for a foundation to foster research to find ways of increasing exports of wheat, dairy products, and other surpluses into the United States.

Mr. President, my good friend from South Dakota has mentioned the binational centers. This amendment deals with those.

It was my privilege to travel throughout South and Central America last year. I found that the binational centers as now constituted there are doing a good job. What makes that success possible is the fact that they are constructed, erected and handled by local people at their own expense.

Students come to these binational centers. These students pay tuition fees to learn English or to get a business education for example. What makes these centers successful, in my humble judgment, is that they are managed and operated by the local people. They are free of any propaganda taint.

Now, simply because we may have some extra money from the proceeds of loans made after the surplus commodities are sold, ways and means are already being developed to utilize the money. To my way of thinking, such efforts will ultimately do violence to the great program of developing binational centers.

I hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a full explanation of the amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This amendment provides for the use of section 104(g) loan payments and interest to finance nonprofit foundations in foreign countries to foster and promote research, education, health and public welfare.

The language of the proposal is so broad—"to foster and promote research, education, health, and public welfare"—as to make the field of operation of the foundations practically unlimited. To take an extreme example, it would be within the legislative language for a foundation to foster research to find ways of increasing exports of wheat, dairy products, and other surpluses into the United States.

The foundations could become permanent institutions, since there would be authority to invest the currencies made available and to use the proceeds of such investments for the authorized purposes.

The question of the various uses to be made of foreign currency loan repayments is being studied by the administration, and recommendations will be submitted to the Congress in ample time for necessary legislation to be enacted before the volume of such repayments become significant. At the present time and during the coming year such repayments do not constitute a problem either in total amount or in any individual country.

Even if it were established that the financing of foundations would be a worthy purpose for which to use loan repayments, the enactment of such authority at this time would not be desirable. Most of the repayments now being received are in countries where such funds are readily usable by the U.S. Government for purposes for which dollars have been appropriated. Use for these purposes returns the appropriated dollars to the U.S. Treasury as net savings to the taxpayer. Under these circumstances any amount of such repayments used for financing binational foundations would represent dollar cost to the U.S. Government.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that on the floor of the Senate repeatedly, in praise of Public Law 480, arguments have been made that the repayments are already in progress and that money is accumulating, inuring to the benefit of the American taxpayer?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The amendment now proposes to devise ways and means to begin to spend that money?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The amendment proposes the establishment of foundations to which these repayments will be given, which foundations will be permitted to invest the money and use the proceeds of the investments for research, education, and the promotion of public health.

Mr. ELLENDER. And public welfare.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And public welfare in foreign countries.

Mr. ELLENDER. In foreign countries. Exactly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. When foundations are established, if they are authorized to invest and use the proceeds, that means that they may become independent foundations in foreign countries to which these repayments will be made.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is entirely correct, and once they are started we will be expected to keep them up.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. I think he has a modification to suggest.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Minnesota would agree to delete the word "research" from the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is agreeable with the Senator from Minnesota. The amendment would then read "for the purpose of fostering and promoting education, health, public welfare, mutual good will, and understanding."

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia discussed that point with me as a cosponsor. It is entirely agreeable to me. He says and perhaps with some justification, that the research might fan out and become competitive with American industry, especially in the field of mining.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the amendment being sponsored by the Senator from South Dakota and myself is the product not of our research alone, but is also the result of recommendations made to the President of the United States, the State Department, the ICA, and the Department of Agriculture by a very splendid task force of distinguished Americans who studied in 27 countries for several months the problems that were accruing relating to the accumulation and administration of local currencies. I have that report in my hand. It is a special report dated August 1958, and on page 39 there is a reference to binational foundations.

This report was signed by Mr. Robert L. Berenson, Director of the International Bank of Washington, and formerly with the Grace Line; Mr. William M. Bristol, director of Bristol-Myers Co., and board chairman of its international division; and Mr. Ralph I. Straus, formerly secretary of R. H. Macy & Co., Inc., and presently a member of its board of directors. He was formerly a director of the Export Promotion Division in the office of the special representative, ECA, Paris.

This group of three distinguished businessmen of this country spent months and months in making a careful study of what to do about the accumulation of currencies, many of which currencies will be worthless unless put to work in the countries of their origin, and their recommendations appear on page 39. The first thing they note is that we in the United States have established the unique investment device of the tax-free foundation for benefiting mankind, and so forth. They point out that this is one of the great contributions that our country could make. They say, "It seems very appropriate to create this same type of institution as a living reminder of the mutual security program of the United States in the underdeveloped areas. To do this, we recommend a program along the following lines." Then it lists the various portions of the amendment which the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from South Dakota have offered, even down to the management of the foundation, on the basis that the foundation shall be managed by a group with representatives equally divided between the host country and the United States.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from the report.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

4. FOUNDATIONS

The United States has utilized the unique investment device of the tax-free foundation for benefiting mankind, especially in the fields of education, health, and welfare. These great eleemosynary institutions such as the Carnegie, Ford, Rockefeller, Guggenheim, and other foundations have contributed so much internationally, that they have carried the message of American generosity and friendship throughout the world. Therefore, it seems very appropriate to create this same type of institution as a living reminder of the mutual security program of the United States in the underdeveloped areas.

To do this, we recommend a program along the following lines: The United States could advantageously use its local currency holdings to establish a foundation in the foreign country to be jointly administered by the latter and the United States. For reasons of maintaining a permanent reminder of the source of the official grants, it would seem desirable that the name of the foundation include the words "United States" or "America," as well as the name of the host country; for example, the "Pakistan-American Foundation for Agricultural Research" or the "United States-India Foundation for Scientific Advancement," etc.

The actual management of the foundation should be by qualified personnel, trained in such work, and under the supervision of a board of trustees of six or eight or more members, half to be appointed by the foreign government and half by the United States, these to select an additional member as their own chairman. Probably some qualified person from the U.S. Embassy could be appointed as a trustee to insure a certain amount of continuity of interest and direction.

The investment of the local currency funds of the proposed foundations offers an interesting opportunity to support and encourage private enterprise in the host country through the medium of purchasing shares of local companies. The bylaws of the proposed foundations should permit great freedom to the management in its investment policy.[4]

The income from the foundations could be used for the creation and/or support of such organizations as would be permitted under its bylaws. These should be drawn to fit the peculiar needs of each country.

[4] Mr. Bristol envisages the possibility of the trustees making some of the funds available as venture capital for new and sound enterprises. He realizes this is probably unorthodox by U.S. standards, but there is a great need to spread the ownership of private industry from the few to the many.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, great good can come from this. We have over $300 million worth of zlotys in Poland. How are we going to use that? There is more good will to be derived in Poland if we put it to work in binational foundations than in almost any other place in Europe.

We have in other parts of the world—in Pakistan, in Burma, in India, in country after country—currency which today is losing its value because of inflation. It is being eroded by inflation. We can put citizen groups to work on a binational foundation basis to promote good will, understanding, education, and welfare for themselves and for ourselves.

I think it is about time that Congress faced the fact that on the one hand, as we export our grain and our fibers, as we create these tremendous resources of currencies, these currencies are being repaid; and as they are repaid, they can be reused. The Treasury of the United States has warned the committees of Congress that we must start to program the use of these currencies. We cannot use them in America. We cannot use, for example, Iranian currency in this country, or Egyptian pounds in America. We would use it in these recipient countries, and we would use it under these terms, not in a governmental agency but in an agency of private individuals, something as American as the Statue of Liberty, a binational foundation.

I hope that we will not reject the proposed amendment. It does not cost us a nickel. As a matter of fact, it will save us money.

Had we had a binational foundation in Spain, we might have created much good will. Already we have lost in Spain one-third of all the value of the currency that we have accumulated because of the failure of use it. Apparently some people think that if we sit on this currency long enough it will hatch. The trouble is it does not hatch; it spoils.

Mr. MUNDT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. What the Senator says about saving the American taxpayer money is exactly correct. We now operate with appropriated dollars these analogous programs as a part of the U.S. information program overseas. The part we can utilize in this fashion, in binational activities, with foreign currency, is the part we can save from appropriated dollars now doing the same kind of work. This is economy, doing a job that needs to be done with money available to us from a source from which we cannot use money effectively in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 3 minutes to my colleague from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, even though I can see some worthy purposes in the amendment, I cannot vote for it, as loosely drawn as the amendment is, because there is no assurance whatever that the United States will get the least bit of credit for it, or that people in foreign countries will know that the money is being spent for their advantage.

The same people who would handle this program are the people who handled the foreign aid fund and paid off the national debt of six foreign countries. They did that, and no one knew that that had been done. Two and a half billion dollars was used to pay off the national debt of these foreign countries. The people in the foreign countries did not know that it had been done. The American people did not know about it. Congress did not know anything about it. No one knew anything about it until years after it had happened.

It has been mentioned that if we do not give the money away quickly, and without setting up any standards or without any assurance that we will get any credit whatever for doing it, the value of money will depreciate.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that we should have had an agreement with the foreign countries in the way of a maintenance-of-value arrangement. We never made such an arrangement. As a result, the value of the currency was squeezed out. We ought to make them reimburse us with more funds. I think something along this line could be done, but I think we ought to know what is going to be done with this money rather than find out 3 or 4 years later how we got rid of this money without anybody in the country knowing about it.

That is the basis of this amendment, and that is the basis on which I am going to vote against it. On that basis I must vote against it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I must rise in opposition to this amendment. I do not stand opposed to what is said to be the purpose of the amendment. I can see that under proper circumstances it might result in good. But when I look at the amendment I wonder how foolish the Congress can get.

Here is an amendment which does not even provide how these people are to get the money. According to the amendment, as I see it, the Foundation would practically have a right to demand it. Then it could obtain American assets—I do not care whether they are zlotys or something else. For one thing, the moneys would not be appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator does not wish to make a misstatement. This is an amendment to section 104 of Public Law 480, to insert a new section. The President must make the loan or grant, and it must go through the appropriation process. The proposed amendment is an amendment to a section. I respectfully suggest that the Senator study the law.

Mr. ALLOTT. I also would like to invite the Senator's attention to one other feature of the amendment. Can the Senator tell me anything—including research—that is not included in the language, "for the purpose of fostering and promoting education, health, public welfare, and mutual good will and understanding"? If the Senator can show me anything that is not included, I will withdraw my objection. But literally I know of almost nothing—except shining shoes; perhaps that is not included—that is not included in this definition.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. It seems to me that the time has come for us to say where our money shall go, and not put it into any more of these broad-ended gifts, grants, and loans, when we cannot keep control of it and know where it is going.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I have no doubt the Senator's purpose is lofty; but certainly neither the Congress nor the executive branch will ever be able to control the amounts appropriated, granted, or loaned under this amendment.

Mr. STENNIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 minute for the Senator from Minnesota to answer?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. First, this is an amendment to section 104 of Public Law 480. It is designated as an amendment to section 104(g), relating to loans for promotion of multilateral trade and economic development. The standards are set in section 104(g). The President himself is authorized to make whatever loans or grants he determines are necessary under the appropriation process of the Congress. So what we are really doing is providing that the Appropriations Committees of the Congress shall review the requests of the President relating to loans or grants, of funds that are paid in, including both principal and interest, to a binational foundation in which we have a 50-percent representation.

Furthermore, the recommendations provide that the President of the United States, speaking for the Government of the United States, may lay down whatever rules and regulations are required relating to the use of our funds.

Mr. ALLOTT. I hove only 1 minute. Let me say this in answer to my friend. I am sure the Senator does not seriously contend that under the provisions of this amendment the U.S. Congress or the President will ever be able to keep control of the money that goes into this fund.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Congress will be able to keep better control under this amendment than it does under any provision of Public Law 480 up to date, because we would require that all these transactions go through the Appropriations Committees.

Mr. ALLOTT. We appropriate directly for it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am rather surprised that the Congress was not concerned about this question before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a few brief questions of the senior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. STENNIS. Let me observe that it seems to me this is a very broad amendment, and a very fine one, if it could be properly handled; but it certainly has not been fully explained, although the fine points have been made.

Reference is made to agreements. As I understand, those will be agreements made between the President and the other countries.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. Are there any guidelines or limitations upon the amount that can be agreed to, or upon the proportionate percentage we would furnish and the other country would furnish? Is there anything of that nature in the amendment?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. Under the law as it is now written, the proceeds from the sale of these commodities may be used in 16 or 17 different ways, aside from lending much of it to the purchasing country.

In the past 2 or 3 years, the amount of the loans, percentagewise, has been decreasing, because there is greater use of the proceeds for purposes of education and things of that kind. All of that, as I have said, must be included in the agreement.

Mr. STENNIS. Does the agreement referred to in the amendment mean a 50–50 arrangement, under which we would furnish 50 percent and the agreeing nation the other 50 percent?

Mr. ELLENDER. Oh, no.

Mr. STENNIS. What percentage will be furnished——

Mr. ELLENDER. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. STENNIS. Then the other country will not furnish anything? We will furnish all the funds?

Mr. ELLENDER. We are lending back as much as 42 percent of the proceeds of the sale, on an average. Instead of that money being used for our purposes when it is repaid, it would be used for the purposes described in the amendment.

Mr. STENNIS. It would be a plan under which we would furnish all the financing.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. I had not understood that.

With regard to promoting research, is there any limitation on the kind of research which would be included?

Mr. ELLENDER. That feature has been eliminated. The purposes now are to promote education, health, public welfare, and mutual good will and understanding.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is there anything in this amendment to assure us that if we start spending all this money to provide for education, health, public welfare, and mutual good will and understanding, the country spending for the same purposes will not reduce its expenditures for the same purposes?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is nothing in the amendment to prevent that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. These are binational foundations of private individuals.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let us let them remain so. That is exactly the argument I made a while ago. The Senator from Minnesota wants to take them out of the hands of those who now handle them. I repeat what I said a while ago. It has been my experience that binational centers have done a great job in South and Central America for the reason that they are owned, administered, and controlled by the local people. But some of our administrators of ICA and USIS desire to get us into the picture and to have the United States furnish money not only to assist in administering the binational centers, but even to erect buildings. That would be very costly. Also, the buildings would be owned, not by the Government, but by these private individuals who direct the binational centers.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, who is a keen student of this particular legislation, as well as other legislation, what he expects to use Polish zlotys for, since they belong to the account of the United States of America? There is more currency in Poland today than in any other country except India. What does the Senator expect to do with that currency, if we cannot put it to some use of this kind?

Mr. ELLENDER. Poland has not been asking for economic aid, but, to be perfectly frank, I would be inclined to prefer to let the Poles use some of those zlotys for economic development, in order to wean them away from their Communist rulers, rather than creating binational centers.

Mr. HUMPHREY. We do that; but when the economic loan is repaid, is there any reason why we should not permit them to use the money again for the purposes described in the binational agreement?

Mr. ELLENDER. Let us use it as a revolving fund, to do some economic expansion. The trouble is we are trying to use these funds for purposes that are now under the control of individuals in the various countries where binational centers are constructed. I can point out to the distinguished Senator many countries in Central America where there are many Americans who put up their own cash in order to construct binational centers. Then, from the fees collected from the students who attend school at the binational centers, and who use the libraries of the binational centers, all under control by local people, sufficient funds are obtained to operate the binational centers.

If we proceed to put our hand in the pie and furnish money, the local people are going to lose interest in it. That is why I want to leave it as it is.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; if I have more time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will yield for a question, if I can answer it in a minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that the binational foundations, as the Senator says, are doing good work?

Mr. ELLENDER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that the recommendation of those who have studied the problem of our Government is that some of the local currencies which are not of value to us, but are only of value in the countries of their origin, should be put to work, so as to be of value to us in the programs contemplated under the amendment?

Mr. ELLENDER. I could name a group of persons who have made studies such as those to which the Senator has referred and who take an opposite view.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Two years ago the Senator from Minnesota stood on the floor of the Senate and argued for funds for the translation of scientific documents overseas with foreign currencies. I had the fight of my life. It was said, "Oh, we cannot do this; we cannot do that." But since that time we have translated hundreds of thousands of documents by using foreign currencies to pay for it.

Had we used such currencies before sputnik, we might not have come in second. We are apparently addicted to the fact that we are going to have currency accumulating in other countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been used.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill. I am reluctant to voice a discordant note in this farm-happy atmosphere.

I intend to vote "nay" on the bill to extend Public Law 480, in protest against the extravagant, dangerous farm-surplus situation in the United States.

Public Law 480 was first proposed as a temporary emergency measure, with the hope that changes would be made in the basic legislation to alleviate the pressures which were creating surpluses. I favored the law for that reason.

But no such helpful changes of importance have been made. The situation has worsened. Public Law 480 now acts as a spur to further increasing surpluses.

Consider wheat. The Government now owns $3 billion worth of wheat, costing $1,500,000 a day in handling, storage, and interest charges. Thirty percent of the value of our surplus products lies in wheat. Yet wheat represents only 6 percent of farm income in the United States.

This situation has become intolerable and will become catastrophic unless we change our course.

Public Law 480, in the guise of helping our neighbors and reducing our surpluses, has become a spur to further surpluses. We need more production, it is said, to implement Public Law 480. So instead of being a stopgap, it has become a loophole, which is a very unpopular word.

I shall vote against the extension bill in full protest against the extravagant subsidy involved in the whole high-price farm-support program.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BUSH. I yield to my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. I wish to state that I associate myself with the statement the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] has made; and, for the reasons which he has so well stated, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the acting minority leader yield me 1 minute out of the minority's time on the bill?

Mr. BUSH. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I hope we will not reject an amendment which gives us an opportunity to achieve some really constructive results in the area of good will and international accomplishment with foreign currency which otherwise is likely to deteriorate and disappear. Not one word has been said against this by Senators in all this debate. It is only a question of how the program will be financed. Our amendment proposes to finance it with money from funds which are received under Public Law 480, instead of having to finance it entirely by profitable dollars in those areas where we have to. We have some programs operating which, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has said, are entirely financed by Americans abroad and wealthy foreigners abroad. We have some which require a little assistance from the Federal Government as they get underway. We should be extending and expanding them in other cities. The money is piling up and doing nothing, yet all we say is that they should be given an appropriation. Congress has the right to appropriate from the counterpart funds sufficient money to keep this program going and to add others, and thus create good will institutions.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add at the appropriate place the following: "Provided, That prior to such grants and loans the recipient nations shall give assurance that there will be no diminution of effort and expenditures by the recipient country to care for the same educational, health, and public welfare programs."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to accept that modification. I think it is a very constructive endeavor. I fully concur in it. The Senator from Louisiana has always expressed this attitude. I hope we will accept it. If my cosponsor, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] accepts it, we are perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. MUNDT. I am perfectly willing to do so. I think this will be the ultimate outcome of the program anyway.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I offer it because it seems to me that while there should be considerable assurance of closer standards with respect to this matter, it seems to me that when we start to spend money for education and welfare services in foreign nations, the foreign nations should not reduce their own expenditures for the same purpose, and, therefore, shift the burden off onto Uncle Sam for things which they are already providing themselves.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is an excellent one. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed just before the vote on the Binational Foundations amendment a statement I have prepared on this subject.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

BINATIONAL FOUNDATIONS

This amendment authorizes the President to negotiate and carry out agreements to establish in friendly countries nonprofit foundations to foster and promote research, education, health, and public welfare.

This amendment specifies that such foundations should be directed by a board of trustees composed of U.S. nationals and nationals of the country in which the foundation is located.

It authorizes the President to grant or loan in accordance with the provisions of section 104, and without regard to the provisions of Public Law 213 (the Battle Act), to any foundation established under this title local currencies which accrue to the United States as repayments of principal and payment of interest on loans made under section 104g. The foundations will become increasingly important as loans made under section 104 are repaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, as amended. [Putting the question.]

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President I move that the vote by which the amendment, as amended, was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. MUNDT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this has been a long day. If there are no other amendments, I am ready for action on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open for further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from the further consideration of H.R. 8609, and that the Senate proceed to consider H.R. 8609, which is a bill on the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 8609) to amend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, as amended, by extending the authorities of titles I and II, strengthening the program of disposals through barter, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Do I correctly understand that what the Senator from Louisiana is really doing is asking for the substitution of the House bill?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that all after the enacting clause of H.R. 8609 be stricken and that the language of the Senate bill be inserted in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H.R. 8609) was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes."

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask that the bill, as amended, be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on the question of final passage of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement.

Before I left the Chamber a few minutes ago, I had been asked by other Senators whether there would be a yea-and-nay vote on the question of final passage of the bill to extend Public Law 480. I assured them that there would, inasmuch as I had asked for the yeas and nays.

However, I have been told that the bill was passed by a voice vote while I was out of the Chamber.

Therefore, I desired the vote on the question of passage to be reconsidered, and that was done; and now the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of passage of the bill.

That is the only statement I care to make; and at this time I am glad to have the yea-and-nay vote taken on the question of passage of the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, has the voice-vote vote which was taken on the question of passage of the bill been reconsidered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the Senate now about to take a yea-and-nay vote on the question of passage of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. On this vote, a vote "yea" will be in favor of passage of the bill, will it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I ask unanimous consent—in order to save time—that a statement I have prepared on this subject be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCHOEPPEL

At the conclusion of this discussion on this important agriculture measure Public Law 480, I think it is well for us to have before us again what this important measure has done.

Let us consider just a few—important matters in this regard.

SUMMARY OF OPERATIONS

Agreements signed since the beginning of the program provide for the shipment of 840 million bushels of wheat, 4 million bales of cotton, 33.5 million bags of rice, 3.3 billion pounds of vegetable oil, 210 million bushels of feed grains, 250 million pounds of tobacco, 120 million pounds of meat, 180 million pounds of lard, 285 million pounds of dairy products, 175 million pounds of fruit and vegetables, as well as other commodities.

In 1955–56, the first full year of operation of title I, foreign currency shipments totaled $427 million at export market value, or 12 percent of total U.S. agricultural exports. During 1956–57 title I shipments amounted to $900 million, nearly 20 percent of the total; during 1957–58 about $650 million, approximately 16 percent; and during 1958–59, $725 million, about 20 percent.

Agreements signed to date will result in foreign currency payments of more than $3.7 billion. About 60 percent of the total will be used for economic development purposes in importing countries, about 10 percent will be used to support the defense forces of our allies, and the remaining 30 percent is planned for meeting U.S. expenses overseas and expanding certain U.S. programs.

Title I originally provided for an authorization of $700 million in terms of what it costs the Government to supply commodities under the program. The value of these commodities at current world prices, of course, is considerably less. This authorization has been raised four times and now is $6.25 billion. Nearly $5.1 billion of this limit has moved or will move under more than 150 agreements signed with 38 friendly countries. Agreements totaled about $500 million in the year ending June 30, 1955, $1 billion in 1955–56, $1.5 billion in 1956–57, $1 billion in 1957–58, and $1.1 billion last year.

For certain commodities the program has been particularly important. For example, more than half the total U.S. wheat exports during the past fiscal year, or about 230 million bushels, moved under title I; also, about 750 million pounds of soybean oil and cottonseed oil, or about 65 percent of total edible oil exports; about one-third of rice exports; and one-fifth of cotton shipments.

USES OF FOREIGN CURRENCIES

Foreign currencies received in payment for commodities are deposited to the account of the United States overseas and are used for purposes authorized in section 104 of Public Law 480 and specified in the sales agreement. Several departments and agencies have responsibility for administering the expenditure of these currencies. For example, the Department of Agriculture is concerned with the use of currencies for agricultural market development purposes; the International Cooperation Administration for currencies loaned back to importing countries for economic development purposes; and the Export-Import Bank of Washington for currencies loaned to private business firms.

About $52 million in currencies has been tentatively earmarked for agricultural market development under existing agreements. To date, about $12 million of this is being obligated for approved projects together with contributions by private trade organizations cooperating in these projects of nearly $6 million. Trade fair and other activities not involving project agreements with trade groups total the equivalent of about $6 million. Results of these promotion efforts are expanding agricultural outlets. Cotton use is up in several countries, particularly France and Japan; tobacco and wheat consumption is increasing in a number of countries; poultry sales have increased in West Germany; and sales of livestock are being made in South America. In this connection, 40 international exhibits have been held in 16 countries with emphasis on distributing samples to millions of fair visitors.

More than half the foreign currencies expected to accrue under existing agreements will be loaned back to importing countries for use in economic development projects agreed upon with the International Cooperation Administration. Considerable emphasis is placed upon coordinating plans for the use of these funds with the overall development programs of these countries. In approving loan projects for agricultural purposes care is exercised to avoid encouragement of production which would result in reduced outlets for U.S. agricultural commodities.

The extension of Public Law 480 granted in August 1957 provided for relending of foreign currencies, largely to U.S. firms and their affiliates, to assist in the development and expansion of private business in foreign countries. The equivalent of about $225 million is being reserved for these purposes in agreemnets negotiated to date with 22 countries. These funds will be available to private business firms through the Export-Import Bank of Washington when commodities under these agreements are shipped and paid for and proceeds assigned to the bank.

Currencies are also being used for the payment of U.S. expenses abroad; for the procurement of military services and equipment for military assistance; for educational exchange programs; for assistance to American-sponsored schools, libraries, and community centers; for the translation, publication, and distribution of books and periodicals; and for the purchase of goods for other friendly countries.

TRADE DEVELOPMENT

The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, as amended, declared trade expansion as the policy of Congress. A stated objective of this policy was "* * * to stimulate and facilitate the expansion of foreign trade in agricultural commodities produced in the United States."

Section 104(a) was listed as the first currency use "to help develop new markets for U.S. agricultural commodities on a mutually benefiting basis." This was no accident. It was and is the intention of Congress that foreign currencies be used to the maximum extent possible for agricultural market development and that first priority be given this use.

Many amendments have been offered to this important measure. In the main, I think we should be careful that we do not depart from the original intent of this legislation. To do so drastically would cause this measure to lose much of its practical use and effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

So the bill (H.R. 8609) was passed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, and Mr. HICKENLOOPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. For the information of the Senate, I would not expect to have any more rollcalls this evening. At least, I hope there will not be any, and, so far as I am aware, there will not be, and so far as I can control the situation, there will not be.

I desire to have some business pending to be considered tomorrow, and to have the Senate act on the resolution that was submitted earlier today with regard to the House and the Senate expressing their deep realization and appreciation of the basic role labor plays in our economy.

INTEREST RATES ON SERIES E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, first, I should like to ask that Calendar No. 935, H.R. 9035, become the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

EXPRESSION BY CONGRESS OF APPRECIATION OF THE ROLE OF LABOR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the pending business be temporarily laid aside. I want to return to it in a moment, after we consider House Concurrent Resolution 435, which I ask the clerk to state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read by the clerk.

The Chief Clerk read House Concurrent Resolution 435, as follows:

Whereas American labor has raised its standards of productivity to heights unequaled in world history, and

Whereas the efforts of American labor have brought to this country a standard of living that has no parallel, and

Whereas American labor has served the Nation in peace and war, and

Whereas American labor has been a bulwark of freedom, and

Whereas the first Monday in September is traditionally set aside to commemorate the services of working men and women to our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does hereby express its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role that labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration to the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in view of the fact that 99 Senators cosponsored this resolution, it is very obvious it represents the sentiments of most of the Members of the Senate. I should like to have a division vote on passage of the resolution, so as to avoid a rollcall.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state his inquiry.

Mr. MORSE. The resolution is subject to discussion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is debatable.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have some very brief comments I want to make on the resolution, if I may have the floor in my own right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I intend——

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May we have order in the Chamber, please, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MORSE. I will not say to the Senator from Colorado, as was suggested to me this morning when I made the same comment, that he can come closer. I will do my best to have my voice reach the Senator's seat.

Later in the evening I shall discuss some of my views with regard to the meaning of Labor Day and the relationship of organized labor to democratic institutions. However, I am perfectly aware of the fact that there is a desire on the part of many of my colleagues to leave the Chamber, after a long and arduous day. Probably contrary to their expectations, I want to accommodate them. [Applause.]

Therefore, I am not going to speak at any length on this resolution, as the majority leader well knows, although I want to say, Mr. President, this is a very interesting combination of words which I do not think is going to impress the rank and file of organized labor of America this fateful night with any belief that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives of the United States, after all, are greatly concerned about labor. We have demonstrated in recent days our attitude toward labor in the Congress. If we had all this great dedication to the objectives of organized labor in America I most respectfully say we would not have passed a labor bill which contains the no man's land provision the bill contained, and we would not have passed a labor bill which contains what I considered to be all of the wrongs and injustices to labor which I set out in a lengthy speech the other day.

But, Mr. President, I think it is good to express high-sounding sentiments. I think it is good verbally to rededicate ourselves to great ideals. It is somewhat apropos, in connection with the language of the resolution, to relate the advice which some of us in my entering class in the Senate received some 15 years ago, when the incomparable Alben Barkley, whom we always affectionately referred to as the Veep, addressed us, as I recall, at the Press Club, at a party held for new Members of Congress. I only speak from recollection, but I believe the remarks were somewhat as follows:

Senator Barkley said, "I want to call your attention to the verbal patterns which you will experience in the Senate." "Of course," he said, "if some colleague gets up on the floor and refers to you as the 'distinguished Senator from X State,' consider yourself lucky. If your colleague refers to you as 'the able and distinguished Senator from some State,' you had better get a little bit on guard, for the knife is getting a little sharper. If your colleague refers to you as 'the able and distinguished Senator from such and such a State, and my friend,' you can be pretty sure that he is trying to see if the jugular vein is exposed. But if your colleague should refer to you as 'the able and the distinguished and my very good friend from such and such a State,' you either had better get ready to duck or take the stabbing."

I have somewhat that reaction to the nice sounding language of this resolution, in view of what the record of the Senate has been in recent days with regard to the passage of labor legislation. But I always like to see people at least commit themselves to nice, fine sounding sentiments. Since there are very beautiful sentiments set out in the resolution in regard to organized labor, I was privileged to cosponsor the resolution, and I shall be pleased to vote for it when the vote is taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have a standing vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

On a division, the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 435) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the preamble will be agreed to.

Without objection, Senate Concurrent Resolution 76 will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I regret as much as anyone that we found it necessary to meet on this Labor Day. I know that the AFL–CIO in the State of Louisiana invited me to be its speaker at the largest meeting it ever holds in that State, at Shreveport, La., on this date.

I have on occasion found it necessary to work on days which should be holidays, but I never felt that was showing disrespect to any group.

I was rather concerned that my friend, the Senator from Oregon, seemed to feel that the Congress had shown its disrespect to labor by voting for a labor bill which I believe was for the benefit of all organized labor and for the workingman. As one of those who voted for the legislation, I was thanked by a great number of laboring men for voting for the bill which passed the Senate in the first instance.

I heard considerable complaints from some persons about the House bill, but I wish to state for the RECORD, as one who has a great number of friends in organized labor—I believe I have, and I certainly hope so—and as one who has been invited to be the Labor Day speaker in Louisiana at the largest labor meeting, I have yet to hear from a single labor leader in my own State or anywhere else to ask me to vote against the conference report in regard to the bill we passed.

In view of the fact that I did not decline to receive any telephone calls, that I was available to all my friends at all times, and that I received vast numbers of calls from them and told every one of them if he felt the bill was going to be really injurious to labor to let me know the respects in which he thought so, I frankly do not feel that I was doing a disservice to labor, but rather I feel that I was serving labor's best interests when I voted for the measure.

Although there has been some criticism of the measure, I really believe the many friends I have known from time to time in organized labor certainly would have informed me about it—and they have yet to do so—if they really had felt there was any real injury to them involved in the bill which the Senate passed, I believe by a vote of 95 to 2.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, today, as the U.S. Senate plods along through its legislative schedule, I hope we will not forget that this is Labor Day—a day set aside by our Nation to honor the men and women who work not only for a living, but who do as much as any of us to keep America free and strong.

While we have our differences of opinion upon how to legislate and handle the innumerable problems which confront us, such as the action the Senate took last week in approving labor legislation, I believe we all concur and agree that America's working men and women have always rendered unquestioned loyalty to this great Nation. Without this total loyalty, America would not be the great Nation that it is.

I believe that one of the foremost accomplishments of labor in the United States has been its contribution to our surging economy. The purchasing power created by good wages for our working people has stimulated the greatest market for manufactured goods in the history of the world. No nation on earth has ever enjoyed a standard of living similar to that enjoyed in America by people in every walk of life. The people who labor in mills, in factories, in offices, and as public servants, today are making good wages and are producing more, per capita, than ever before in history.

This is, in great part, due to the accomplishments of organized labor. We sometimes get angry at the abuses of a few gangsters or hoodlums within the ranks of labor, just as we have become angry in the past at the abuses of tycoons and the unscrupulous in big business. But, in our free country, we always manage to correct the injustices and surge forward to greater heights of accomplishment without destroying either free enterprise or free labor.

It is fitting that we honor laboring people today, regardless of whether they are organized or not, for everywhere in our land we find a wholesome attitude of a fair exchange of salaries or wages for work accomplished. The greatness of America's economy is in keeping this ratio of wages and production in balance.

Mr. President, I salute the laboring people of America, organized and unorganized, and I pray that they will always remain free, for no nation can remain strong and free itself, if its laboring people are ever bonded in slavery, physically, economically, legislatively, or otherwise.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, earlier today I became a cosponsor on a concurrent resolution introduced by the majority leader, to the effect that Congress realizes and appreciates the basic role which labor plays in our economy, and the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

It is entirely fitting and proper that we in Congress should pause briefly from our pressing business and on this Labor Day reaffirm our appreciation of the American labor movement.

The workingman in America has come a long way since the turn of the century. No doubt further progress will take place in years to come. It is this progress—this desire to move forward—that embodies our American way of life.

It is indeed a pleasure for me to join with the majority leader and my other colleagues in the Senate in saluting American labor.

LABOR DAY 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I rise to support the concurrent resolution.

Sixty-five years ago, on June 28, 1894, to be exact, a great Democratic President, Grover Cleveland, signed into law a bill which read:

> The first Monday of September in each year, being the day celebrated and known as labor's holiday, is made a legal public holiday.

The idea for such a holiday was conceived in 1882 by Peter J. McGuire, of the Knights of Labor, and the organizer of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America.

Labor Day—

Said Peter McGuire—

> is dedicated to peace, civilization, and the triumphs of industry. It is a demonstration of fraternity and the harbinger of a better age—a more chivalrous time, when labor shall be best honored and well rewarded.

We have made great and noble strides in America since the Nation first celebrated Labor Day in 1894. The gains made by working people have been a great chapter in the record of America's achievement and advancement: Hours of labor reduced; wages increased; child labor laws enacted; pension plans instituted; vacations with pay granted; workmen's compensation laws enacted along with unemployment compensation and social security benefits; the right to belong to a union given legal sanction; yellow dog contracts outlawed. Yes, all of these things have been achieved and many more.

Behind all such accomplishments has been the guiding principle that man has certain God-given rights. And this means rights not just for the rich and the powerful, but for all people regardless of their status in life and regardless of their color or creed or religion or national origin or occupation.

We have come a long way in giving meaning to this principle since 1894. But we have still a long way to go.

There are still too many migrant farm workers living in abject poverty. There are still too many Americans who are denied decent jobs, housing and education because of their race, creed, or color. There are still too many Americans who receive substandard wages. There are still too many Americans who live in slums. There are still too many Americans without proper medical care, food and clothing.

The struggle for social justice must continue. The general prosperity of the country must not close our eyes to the job that remains. Today is an appropriate occasion to remember not only how far we have come but also how far we have yet to go in enhancing the dignity of mankind.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Labor Day address as delivered today by the President of the AFL–CIO, George Meany, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEANY URGES RESURGENCE OF UNION FIGHTING SPIRIT

(By George Meany, president, AFL–CIO)

Labor Day was created as a day of dedication rather than one of celebration. The pioneers who founded the trade union movement had precious little to celebrate back in 1882. The unions of those days were weak, impoverished, and the targets of constant harassment by employers. It took a brave man, a man with deep loyalty and plenty of fighting spirit, to join a union and stand by his union under the oppressive conditions that prevailed before the turn of the century.

Today the trade union movement needs above all a rebirth of that fortitude and resolution which enabled Sam Gompers and his associates to lead a parade of progress for humanity unparalleled in human history.

They fought and won despite open warfare by employers and handicaps so great as to make their ultimate victory almost miraculous.

Today, labor faces another kind of warfare—a cold war deliberately invoked against the whole trade union movement by the big business interests of the Nation.

The spokesmen for these interests—such as the National Association of Manufacturers and the chamber of commerce—pay lip service, of course, to the undeniable fact that unions have done a great deal to improve the American way of life and that unions are therefore here to stay.

But at the same time, big business leaders are doing everying in their power to weaken and destroy our trade union movement. Let me cite three major examples:

They have come out for a wage freeze, forming a solid wall of opposition to any further economic gains by the workers of this country. The steel strike, forced upon 500,000 steelworkers and their families, epitomizes this new form of economic pressure.

They have undertaken an all-out campaign of high-powered deception to prevail upon Congress to enact restrictive antilabor laws in the name of accomplishing labor reform.

They have financed at the State level a blistering bombardment to undermine the security of trade unions through adoption of the misnamed right-to-work laws.

These developments are not haphazard or unconnected. They didn't just happen spontaneously. They have been carefully planned and deliberately organized and heavily financed by the big business interests which are determined to cut down the power of organized labor.

That power has been a power for good for the people of our country. It has enabled the workers of America to gain for themselves the highest standard of living prevailing anywhere in the world. It has created the mass markets which have made industry and the farmers prosperous. It has made it possible for the great majority of the people of this country to live in decent homes, to send their children to school and to enjoy some measures of economic and social security.

Are the workers of this country willing to submit tamely to the forfeiture of these gains? Or are they ready to stand up together again, as their forefathers did in the old days, and fight for the preservation of their rights and their trade unions?

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations doesn't have to take a Gallup poll to obtain the answer to those questions.

We know from direct contact with the members of our unions and the leaders of those unions that they are ready to meet the challenge head on.

In that knowledge, the AFL–CIO executive council chartered a program of action.

1. We have officially proclaimed this Labor Day to be "Support the Steelworkers Day," so that the 13.5 million members of our federation and their friends will be able to demonstrate their complete solidarity with the embattled steelworkers. To make that support concrete, the general board of the AFL–CIO will hold a special meeting in San Francisco on September 18. At that meeting, a definite program will be drawn up to mobilize the maximum organizational, financial, and moral support of the entire AFL–CIO to insure victory for the steelworkers. Once that victory is won, the whole wall of resistance erected by big business agents further wage increases will crumble.

2. We have determined that we will have to organize for political education and political action in the same thorough and painstaking way that we organized in the past for economic purposes.

This program will take time and patience and hard work and money. But it is our only hope for the resumption of progress in the future.

We want the American people to understand that labor is entering upon the political battleground with reluctance. If we had any other recourse, we would be happy to stay out of politics. But our enemies have chosen to weaken the trade-union movement through restrictive legislation so that it will be rendered ineffective at the bargaining table.

To remain true to our trust, to fulfill the responsibilities that the workers of this country have delegated to their unions, labor must fight back in the political arena. We intend to use every legal weapon we have, including the right of every citizen to engage in politics, to regain the ground we have lost.

In this effort, education will play a key part. Against the unscrupulous and deceptive propaganda unleashed against us by the opposition, we must rely on the power of truth.

We need not go beyond the facts and the record to prove our case.

The record shows that the AFL–CIO favors and supports the strongest possible law to drive the crooks and racketeers out of the labor-management field. The record shows that State and local authorities have failed to enforce existing laws against the criminal activities of these racketeers.

The record shows that under guise of Federal legislation against corruption big business has sought to prohibit legitimate union activities such as organizational picketing and secondary boycotts.

The record shows that the AFL–CIO has demonstrated its integrity by expelling member organizations found to be dominated by corrupt influences and by establishing strict codes of ethical practice for all affiliated unions and their officers.

The record shows that no business organization has ever taken such stringent action, despite the fact that the frauds and embezzlements perpetrated by business and banking executives make the transgressions committed by a few labor officials look like petty larceny.

The record shows that big business has tried to fool the public by masquerading its legislative attempts to destroy union security under the false front of right-to-work laws in the States.

The record shows that these laws, now in force in 19 States, have not granted the right to a job to a single worker; that they have not improved the economic status of a single worker; that their one and only purpose is to outlaw the union shop.

Once the American people fully understand these facts, the massive antilabor campaign instigated by big business will founder and collapse.

We have our work cut out for us. The opposition possesses unlimited resources and controls the main channels of communication with the public. They have a host of soft-soap artists at their command, skilled in distorting the truth and inventing artful propaganda slogans designed to mislead the public.

But we have on our side the strength of numbers and the power of truth. If we use them, we will win.

On this Labor Day, the trade union movement, with the willing support of the decent working men and women who make up its loyal membership, pledges to work and fight until we do win.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CRIMES IN GREAT CITIES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the September 14, 1959, issue of U.S. News & World Report, which arrived in my office this morning, contains two articles which merit the attention of the Congress. One is entitled "Terror Comes to City Streets," and the other is entitled "In the Nation's Capital: Where Women Are Afraid To Go Out at Night."

The first article points out some of the principal underlying reasons for the current wave of terror, crime, and juvenile delinquency in the big American cities of the North which have acceded to political demands for integration of the races. According to the article, the police, whose job it is to determine the cause of the current crime wave, say that racial frictions are closely related to the upsurge in crime. The article also quotes Dr. Billy Graham as telling several New York ministers that New York City is a racial tinderbox. Dr. Graham is reported further to have said that if the outbreaks of juvenile violence in New York had occurred in a southern city, "there would have been an outcry for Federal troops."

Mr. President, most of the political leaders in these large northern metropolitan areas have been guilty of political hypocrisy in trying to force mixing of the races on the people of the South, where forced integration would bring even more serious consequences than those which have occurred in the large northern cities. I have already called to the attention of the Senate news stories from both the North and South pointing out that the Negroes themselves do not desire forced integration. The New York Times reported last week that thousands of Negro parents are sending their children south for a peaceful and segregated education. I placed this article in the RECORD, as well as another from Birmingham, Ala., which reported that a large group of southern Negroes had wired President Eisenhower of their strong sentiments against forced integration of the races. Since that time, Mr. President, another article has appeared in the national press, reporting that a southern Negro editor feels that the members of his own race are against school desegregation.

The evidence is mounting, Mr. President, and the politicians of the North might as well face the facts now and put their efforts to more fruitful endeavors.

We in the South will not accept an even more mammoth mess than their own people in the North are willing to take.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the articles referred to above be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, following these remarks, together with the article from the Washington Post of September 6, 1959, entitled "Dixie Negroes Oppose Integration, Editor Says."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From U.S. News & World Report, Sept. 14, 1959]

TERROR COMES TO CITY STREETS

(NOTE.—Yokings, murders, assaults, robberies, battles in the streets—that's the record of rising violence in youth crime. In New York, four killings in 8 days stirred alarm. In Washington, a Congressman called for the U.S. Marines. A survey shows why streets are not safe in many cities, why calls are increasing for less coddling of juvenile thugs.)

Terror on the streets is a growing problem in big American cities. In New York, as in Washington, in Philadelphia, in Chicago, and elsewhere, youthful criminals are turning more and more to violence.

Murderous attacks by gangs of teenagers have brought emergency police measures in New York. Four killings, other stabbings, all in an 8-day period, aroused the public. In Washington, D.C., the Nation's Capital, a Member of Congress has demanded that two companies of U.S. Marines patrol the streets at night so that citizens may be safe. Police themselves have issued special instructions to women who must walk or drive on Washington streets.

Philadelphia long has faced a problem of youthful violence. Boston not long ago had a youth-gang killing. The trend in many big cities is up in yokings, criminal assaults, robbery, and street fighting among gangs of youths.

WHAT FIGURES SHOW

The Federal Bureau of Investigation reported on September 2 that the number of juveniles arrested for serious crimes increased by 8.1 percent last year. Their arrests helped push the national crime rate 9.3 percent above 1957.

J. Edgar Hoover, FBI Director, pointed out that the crime rate in 1957, in turn, had been the highest in U.S. history. He called the 9.3 percent increase "shocking." Mr. Hoover said the report showed that some areas are a veritable "no man's land." He criticized citizens who have a "detached attitude toward crime."

On the increasingly large part played by youth in the major crime picture, including murder, rape, and aggravated assault, Mr. Hoover says this:

"The recent scourge of street 'mugging,' sex attacks, bodily assaults, murder, and other carnage by young criminals across the country demands a reappraisal of the ugly reality which is juvenile crime. * * * The growing menace of youthful depradation is the core of the crime cancer in America."

HEAT, HATE, AND SMUT

People ask: "Why?" "What is going on?" "What can be done about it?"

Many explanations are offered for growth in crimes of violence and sex crimes involving teenagers. These range from summer heat waves that drive boys and girls into the streets to racial antagonisms and the increase in distribution of pornographic material.

In New York there was a tendency to blame the August heat wave for the surge in crime which included two outbreaks of teenage gang terrorism in which three boys and a girl were killed. Dr. Robert MacIver, prominent sociologist and director of the city's delinquency-evaluation project, however, discounted that. He said that juvenile crimes flare in the summer because the "disgruntled, the discouraged, and the retarded" congregate then and have nothing to do. New groups coming to cities—often Negroes or Puerto Ricans—live in a "curious tangle of nothingness."

THE RACIAL ANGLE

Police say racial frictions are closely related to the upsurge in crime. Trouble brews, for example, when Negroes or Puerto Ricans move into neighborhoods once regarded as predominantly Irish or Italian.

A young Puerto Rican accused of leading a murderous attack was quoted as saying: "We went there to get the Irish and the Italians. We heard Puerto Ricans were being pushed around in the neighborhood."

The Reverend Billy Graham, in an interview at Asheville, N.C., on September 2, said several New York ministers told him recently that the city is a racial tinderbox. He said that, if the outbreaks of juvenile violence in New York had occurred in a southern city, there would have been an outcry for Federal troops.

A FIERY SERMON

A Roman Catholic clergyman in New York, Msgr. Joseph A. McCaffrey, denounced the city for coddling juvenile gangsters. At funeral services for a 16-year-old victim of a knife-wielding band of youths, the clergyman departed from Catholic custom and preached a sermon excoriating the coddlers. He named them as lenient judges, oversympathetic youth-board consultants, professional do-gooders, and sob sisters, male and female. The prelate said:

"What we should do is to pass a law by which all known members of gangs be arrested and sent to jail. * * * I know that there is a cry that there is no room in jails. * * * Then build more jails. Divert the money from other things, but build them. We cage wild animals. * * * Shall not these boys and girls be caged?"

EASY DAY IN COURT?

It is argued that the weakest link in crime prevention in New York and elsewhere is found in the courts. Last month, for example, a 15-year-old boy accused of stomping a man to death in Brooklyn was released in $5,000 bail by a judge who said he thought it was a case for children's court.

The district attorney disagreed angrily. He said he could not understand why the boy should be free, adding: "I am going to prepare this case for speedy trial on a charge of first-degree murder."

The ferocity of young gangsters who roam big-city streets is intensified by alcohol and narcotics. Henry L. Giordano, Deputy Commissioner of the Federal Narcotics Bureau, said that large quantities of dope still are being smuggled into this country from sources which include Red China. Much of the dope traffic centers in New York.

A CALL FOR MARINES

In Washington, a number of Congressmen are calling for an all-out attack on hoodlumism in the District of Columbia. The demand for a patrol of U.S. Marines was made on August 25 by Representative OMAR BURLESON, Democrat of Texas. He cited:

"The beating and robbery of the widow of Deputy Secretary of Defense Donald Quarles by a street gang;

"The killing of a Bolling Air Force Base sergeant by a gang of young toughs he caught tampering with his car;

"A beating and robbery on August 14, witnessed by Representative CHARLES C. DIGGS, Democrat of Michigan."

Representative DIGGS, one of four Negroes in Congress, said the six Negro youths who committed the atrocity were "just like a pack of wolves." He maintained that the incident pointed up a great need for social responsibility on the part of Washington's Negro community.

For this, he was criticized by Eugene Davidson, a former president of the Washington branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who insisted that the racial issue should not be highlighted.

ONE CITY'S STRATEGY

In New York, Governor Rockefeller is mobilizing State, city, religious, and other forces in an attempt to meet the juvenile-crime emergency.

The Governor scheduled a top-level meeting in his New York City office on September 8 to chart action against what he called the great tragedy of murderous, juvenile violence.

POLICE ACTION

Mayor Robert F. Wagner, in the wake of the outbreaks of juvenile terrorism, ordered diversions of funds from other city services to add 1,089 policemen to the rolls. This will bring the police department to its full budgeted strength of 24,508.

FORCE AGAINST FORCE

Stephen P. Kennedy, police commissioner, detached 1,400 policemen from other duties and created a special task force to patrol areas frequented by New York's 150 teenage hoodlum gangs. He promised stern justice.

NO MORE "KID GLOVES"

The handling of New York juvenile-delinquency problem was taken largely from social workers and entrusted to the police.

WHAT IT ALL MEANS

In New York and elsewhere, law-enforcement officials are calling for:

1. An end to "coddling" of young criminals by the courts.

2. Curfew laws for teenagers, such as those already in effect in Chicago, Philadelphia, and Detroit.

3. Laws holding parents responsible for the actions of juvenile offenders.

4. Crackdown on teenage gangs before they can stage organized violence.

5. A camp system, modeled along the lines of the depression era Civilian Conservation Corps, to get potential troublemakers off city streets in summer.

The latest outbursts of youth gang violence in New York served to emphasize and dramatize the jungle-like savagery which is causing concern throughout the country.

The view is growing in the United States that sentimentality or softness toward young criminals can lead only to greater terror.

IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL: WHERE WOMEN ARE AFRAID TO GO OUT AT NIGHT

(NOTE.—In Washington, D.C., the Nation's Capital, there is growing danger for women. The story of violence and terror is told in an article from the Washington Star of August 30, reprinted below. This account includes a set of suggestions by the police department to guide women, whether driving a car or walking on streets—in better neighborhoods or elsewhere.)

Washington is becoming a city of closed doors for many of its women residents.

The continuing wave of purse snatchings, yokings, and other assaults on the street has frightened many women into not venturing out at night.

Interviews by the Star with scores of women after the recent unprovoked attack on Mrs. Donald A. Quarles, widow of the Deputy Secretary of Defense, have revealed this picture:

Women who have been the victims of a purse snatcher, whether or not violence was involved, still are nervous and afraid months later.

They prefer not to go out after dark. On occasions when they must, they start at every footfall, feel uneasy and upset until they are back behind their own doors—which they all keep carefully locked.

Women who have been the victims of violence are even more intimidated. Some have changed jobs, in order not to be out after dark.

In discussing their experiences, they ask that their names not be revealed.

Some, whose attackers have been apprehended and convicted, fear retaliation for their testimony when the attacker gets out of jail. To forestall this, some have tried to "get lost." They have moved, leaving no forwarding addresses, and acquired unlisted telephones.

"I used to feel safe anywhere," said one woman who lives very close to where Mrs. Quarles was knocked down by a pickpocket.

"I have walked around what people said were the bad streets of Chicago during the war. No one ever came near me. I've lived in Washington long enough to know the good from the bad," she said.

Yet she was set upon on Connecticut Avenue, right near the Shoreham Hotel, and while accompanied by two women friends.

"Since then I haven't felt safe anywhere," she said. "My friends don't either. We used to go back and forth to each other's houses to play cards at night. We don't do it any more."

She is one of the women who has moved and tried to bide her identity.

"It sort of makes you afraid to leave your front door," said another. "I guess I was lucky. I didn't get hurt. Another woman whose purse was snatched the same day as mine lost her eyesight."

Most of the women interviewed, while wishing the police could do more, are inclined to be sympathetic with the men on the force.

"The way that one policeman was beaten up recently, they're not very safe themselves," one woman said sympathetically. "They used to travel in twos. I think maybe they should go in three or fours."

A Senator's wife whose purse had been taken feels strongly that the courts are the key to the problem.

"It all goes back to too-lenient sentences," she said. "I don't think there is a thing a woman can do—except hide in her house—until we get ride of these hoodlums. You can't struggle with these characters. They're many times stronger than you are. But if the judge threw a good stiff sentence at them, it would keep them off the street for a time, and make them think twice before attacking someone else."

The District police department has a lot of suggestions for women who want to avoid dangerous encounters.

Lt. Murray Kutner of the robbery squad makes these suggestions:

1. Always travel with a companion, if possible.

2. Stick to well-traveled, well-lighted streets wherever possible, whether on foot or in a car.

3. If you must enter a poorly lighted street, take a good look first, to see if anyone is loitering. If you have the slightest suspicion of anyone, go to the nearest home and ask the occupant to call police, or let you call. Usually a householder will invite a frightened woman to come inside, the lieutenant added.

4. Do not hesitate to call police because you aren't sure and "feel foolish" about your suspicions. "That is what police are for," Lieutenant Kutner says. "They don't mind going out on 100 such calls, if it just turns up one crime."

5. Carry your purse hugged close to you. A purse hanging loose over the arm—or, worse, yet, an over-the-shoulder bag flapping behind you—often is an unbearable temptation to an "impulse" purse thief, Lieutenant Kutner said.

6. Personal safety also dictates clutching your purse close to you. Generally, if a woman gets hurt, "it's because the thief snatched her purse and the strong strap wrenched her arm," Lieutenant Kutner said. "Sometimes the force of the tug throws her to the ground."

7. If a brash thief does grab for your closely held purse, at least you have a chance to look at his face. You often don't see the thief who snatches your dangling bag.

8. Don't carry much cash, and don't carry jewels or other valuables, including important papers.

9. If you are accosted despite these precautions, don't struggle. "Cooperate for the safety of the person," is the way Lieutenant Kutner puts it.

10. If your purse is taken, don't wait until you get home to call police. Call them immediately.

11. Don't lay down your purse on a store counter.

12. On a busy streetcar platform, don't suspect the one who jostles you, but one on the other side. The jostler is probably trying to draw your attention while the other one "lifts" your purse or wallet.

13. Scream if you like—"who's going to stop a woman from screaming?" the lieutenant asks. But remember that it may excite the thief, and cause him to turn back and belt you.

Lieutenant Kutner has a special set of suggestions for women in automobiles, as follows:

1. Stay on well-traveled streets.

2. Keep your car door locked.

3. Keep your windows up, even on hot nights, except for the one next to the driver, which you may need to give traffic signals.

4. Don't leave your pocketbook on the seat. Put it in the glove compartment or on the floor under your feet.

5. Always keep the car in gear. If anyone suspicious approaches you, "take off." This is true even if it means running a red light, Lieutenant Kutner says. "That will attract the police as fast as anything you can do, and after all, that's what you want," he said.

6. If someone tries to cut you off with his car, or otherwise acts suspiciously, get his license number and report it to police as soon as possible.

7. As far as practicable, park in a lighted spot. And look around for loiterers before leaving the car.

DIXIE NEGROES OPPOSE INTEGRATION, EDITOR SAYS

JACKSON, MISS., September 5.—Percy Greene, editor and publisher of Mississippi's only Negro newspaper, said today southern Negroes do not want public-school desegregation and those who have taken action were prodded by the NAACP.

Greene said in the Jackson Advocate there never has been a spontaneous effort by a Negro family in the South to integrate a white school.

"Every movement to put Negro children in white schools in the South has been urged by the NAACP and usually with some financial guarantee to the family of the child or children involved," Greene said.

The Negro editor asked that northern Negroes not be regarded as spokesmen for his race in the South. He said they "do not understand our southern bicultural society."

A white storekeeper meanwhile backed down on his plan to build a home for his family in a Negro neighborhood here after 82 Negroes protested that they preferred segregated housing.

W. J. Garrett, 62, told Hinds County building permits director G. H. Harris he would not carry out his plan to construct a house in a Negro section.

The 82 Negroes signed a petition saying that "Mr. Garrett has three teenage daughters and, of course, there are a lot of young colored boys in this area. We do not want anything to happen which would cause any trouble."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me with respect to what he has just said?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall take only a minute, and I intend to be brief. I have had occasion today to reply to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina on the same subject, and I should like to reply briefly to the distinguished Senator, for whom I have very high personal regard, on what he has said.

Mr. President, I believe we are paying the penalty for a long number of years in which we have failed to bring up to parity the education, housing, and employment opportunities of the Negro members of all our communities. I believe that has been especially true of the Southern States.

Mr. President, I think the fundamental and sincere difference which exists between people like myself and the great majority of opinion in the country on the one hand, and the opinion in Southern States on the other hand, with respect to the desegregation of public schools, is this: Are we ever going to have an end to this, or is the mess going to go on for a hundred or a hundred and fifty years or more? We must bring an end to it, and the way to do it is to have every citizen a first-class citizen, with the right to study in the same place with every other citizen.

Mr. President, these gentlemen do not agree with us. I believe they want to continue the very conditions which have brought us to this difficulty. I believe what the rest of us want to do is at long last to begin to make an end of it. That is the real controversy.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New York, I would say that this is a matter for the States to handle. We will not have an end to it so long as some legislators and some people from some sections who know nothing about conditions in other sections try to force upon people a way of life which they are not going to accept.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

Mr. President, this is a matter for each State. I can tell the distinguished Senator from New York now that South Carolina—and I speak for South Carolina in the Senate—is not going to accept integration; that South Carolina is following the Constitution; that the Constitution leaves this matter to each State.

When people try to force upon other States something which they have no right under the Constitution to do, we expect to oppose it and oppose it bitterly and to the end. I am putting the Senator from New York on notice now, and any other persons also, who try to force upon the States something that they have no right to do, we will oppose them.

The Constitution delegated certain powers to the Central Government when the Union was founded. States were in existence before the Nation was founded. The only powers the Federal Government has are those given to it in the Constitution. The Constitution contains all the rights of the Federal Government.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. Those powers are listed in the Constitution. The States have all other rights. They have never delegated them. They have never delegated the question of education. They have never delegated a great many other matters. Therefore the States have exclusive jurisdiction in those fields.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is this not an attempt to export the deplorable social conditions which exist in interracial schools in New York City and which are a stench in the nostrils of the decent people of this country?

Mr. THURMOND. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, and if the Senator from New York wishes to render such a great service to this country, I suggest he go back to New York City and clean up his own mess there first.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. We have not had a single racial incident in South Carolina. We have segregation in South Carolina, and we do not have trouble down there. I do not see why we need people from New York or any other State to tell us how to run our business when we are having no trouble. We are having peace and harmony. The Senator from New York is trying to create tensions and start racial hatreds among people of different races in my State.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. I ask the Senator to compare the peace, harmony, and lawfulness in South Carolina, Mississippi, and other States with the murder, rape, theft, and criminality existent in other States, with police patrolling the corridors of the schools of New York City. Yet the Senator from New York says, in effect, that that is what he wants to import into the Southern States.

Mr. THURMOND. I heartily agree with what the Senator from Mississippi has said. It is not necessary for me to tell the Senate the story. The newspapers and magazines in recent weeks have almost daily carried accounts of crime after crime in integrated New York. They have not carried a single account of crime in South Carolina that I know anything about. We are having no trouble in the South. Where is the trouble? It is in the integrated sections of the country.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is not the Senator ashamed that such conditions exist anywhere in the United States?

Mr. THURMOND. If I lived in that State I would be ashamed of it. Such conditions as that would send a flush of shame to my cheeks and a pang of regret to my heart.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. Who is the Senator from New York, to advise Southern States how to operate their schools and conduct their social affairs? Why does he not go to New York, and promote justice, harmony, and lawfulness in his own State?

Mr. THURMOND. He has a wide open field in New York to do a great deal of good. With all the crime that has been committed—murders, rapes, and other atrocious crimes—in New York, it seems to me that he would have his hands full if he were to stay in New York City and work among his own people.

Mr. EASTLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina this question——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I make a point of order. I respectfully suggest that the comments being made by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Mississippi, under rule XIX, reflect on the great Empire State.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the Senator from South Carolina will——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I cannot hear what the Chair is saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no choice. Under the rule the Senator from South Carolina will take his seat.

Mr. MORSE. I move that the Senator be permitted to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD show that the Senator from South Carolina did not bring on this controversy. I may say I think the subject has been fully discussed, and I have nothing else to say.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. If I may yield without losing my right to the floor, I am glad to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator permit the senior Senator from South Carolina to yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. I yield for a question, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is there a single policeman patrolling the corridors in a single school in South Carolina at this time?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Not that I know of. I would answer that question "No," but I am not down there all the time. I have never known of such a thing.

RACIAL PROBLEMS OF THE NATION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, several newspaper stories of extreme interest came to my attention over the weekend, and I now wish to bring them to the attention of the Members of the Senate.

These items deal with racial relations. In the first place, I see that Governor Rockefeller of New York has been enrolled as a life member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. This fact was contained in an Associated Press dispatch, datelined New York, September 4, 1959, which appeared in nearly every major newspaper in America.

It is regretful that the Governor of a State would enlist himself in such a controversial partisan organization, which is promoting forced integration upon people all over this land and which has promoted forced integration within the boundaries of the State of New York, and principally in cities in New York such as New York City itself, the result of which has brought tragedy to that State and to the sidewalks of New York.

I hope Governor Rockefeller has only joined the NAACP as a political gesture to enlist the votes of the members of the NAACP, and has not joined that organization with any plan to carry out the programs of that organization, some of whose past members have been affiliated with organizations listed by the Attorney General's office of the United States as being subversive in nature.

Mr. President, on Saturday, September 5, 1959, the Chicago Daily Tribune, one of the largest newspapers printed in America, carried an article datelined Jackson, Miss., entitled "Negroes Rip Integration—Attack White's Plan To Enter Area."

Mr. President, this item relates that 82 Jackson, Miss., Negroes signed a petition protesting the moving into their segregated all-Negro neighborhood of a white man who was planning to set up a business and home in that area. These Negroes said that Mr. White, by moving into that area with his family, was inviting trouble. Spokesmen for the Negro group declared:

We believe that the races should be segregated as far as possible, and for these purposes this petition (seeking to prohibit the white man and his family from moving into that area) is respectfully submitted.

Mr. President, I believe this is the strongest evidence possible that has yet been presented to the Congress that segregation is desired by everyone in the South, and that not even the Negroes, with the exception of imported officials of the NAACP, desire to integrate.

I am glad to report that the followup to this story is that the white person involved has happily agreed not to move into the Negro area, and not to establish his home and business there, as requested by the Negroes of that section of Jackson, Miss. I commend the Negroes of that area for their desire to remain segregated, and for their courage in speaking up in this manner. Segregation is a mode of life in the South, and it is peacefully enjoyed by both whites and Negroes.

I hope those who are promoting forced integration through civil-rights legislation and other means will desist in their efforts, for we living in the segregated areas of this Nation do not wish to have conditions such as we find in New York and elsewhere forced upon us.

Mr. President, to support my charge that integration has been forced upon persons living in places such as New York and other large cities outside of the South, I bring to the attention of the Members of the Senate an article appearing in the Washington Post and Times Herald of this morning, September 7, 1959, entitled "Crowd Attacks Pickets Protesting Racial Ban."

This article relates how a crowd of citizens in Baltimore attacked some pickets who were protesting the exclusion of Negroes from an amusement park.

Mr. President, apparently the attempt of some Negroes to force themselves into the segregated park brought on the riot. There were more than 500 persons involved, and there were several persons injured and threats to "get a rope" implied possible desire on the part of some of the mob to lynch one of the pickets.

Mr. President, this is another example of what results when people attempt to force themselves to mingle with others who do not desire to mingle.

Mr. President, I likewise bring to the attention of the Members of the Senate an article originating in New York City, appearing in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning, September 7, 1959, entitled "Puerto Rican Beaten—Six Youths Arrested."

Mr. President, this article describes how a gang of white youths beat up an 18-year-old after he said he was a Puerto Rican. This is just a continuation of juvenile gang fights in New York; but in nearly every instance it has been brought out in reports that there are whites versus Puerto Ricans, or Puerto Ricans versus Negroes, or Negroes versus Puerto Ricans or versus whites. In this instance, the article relates that the white group was out to get the Puerto Rican group. We can expect next week, probably, to get a report that the Puerto Ricans beat up a white group in some reprisal.

Mr. President, I abhor a white group attacking a Puerto Rican just as much as I would abhor a Puerto Rican attacking a Negro, or a Negro group attacking some other Negro. The reason why I bring this article, and these other articles, to the attention of the Senate is that, when assembled together, they all present a picture of what happens when integration is forced upon people. There is no question that forced integration has caused much of this havoc, and I implore the Members of the Senate not to hastily go after politically inspired civil-rights legislation that would foster conditions which we find in these cities in other areas of the Nation which practice segregation and which do not have these same problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 5, 1959, entitled "Negroes Rip Integration—Attack White's Plan To Enter Area," and the two articles from the Washington Post and Times Herald of September 7, 1959, entitled "Crowd Attacks Pickets Protesting Racial Ban," and "Puerto Rican Beaten—Six Youths Arrested," be printed in the body of the RECORD with my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune, Sept. 5, 1959]

NEGROES RIP INTEGRATION—ATTACK WHITE'S PLAN TO ENTER AREA

JACKSON, MISS., September 4.—A group of Negroes Friday protested integration of their neighborhood by a white man who they said is planning to build a home in the Negro section.

A petition to the Hinds County Board of Supervisors requesting that H. J. Garrett be refused a building permit was signed by 82 Jackson Negroes.

"Mr. Garrett has three teenage daughters and, of course, there are a lot of young colored boys in this area," the petition said. "We do not want anything to happen which would cause any trouble."

BELIEVE IN SEGREGATION

County Attorney Paul G. Alexander, representing some of the petitioners, presented the petition to the supervisors.

"We believe that the races should be segregated as far as possible and for these purposes this petition is respectfully submitted," the Negro group said. "It would be our impression that if the situation were reversed, you would in some way prevent a colored person from doing the same thing in an exclusively white neighborhood."

"Most of us in this area own our homes," the petition continues. "Some of us have our homes paid for. We are proud of our homes and our community.

BUYS TWO LOTS

The group said Garrett had purchased two lots in their area and planned to build a service station, a store, and a home on them. They said they had no objection to the store and service station, but they did not want the Garrett family living among them.

"If there is anything that you can do to deny Mr. Garrett a building permit on the property which he has just purchased for the erection of a store, a service station, and a home, we would be forever grateful."

CROWD ATTACKS PICKETS PROTESTING RACIAL BAN

BALTIMORE, September 6.—Violence erupted amid the celebration of "All Nations Day" at an amusement park today when an angry crowd attacked pickets protesting the exclusion of Negroes.

Five pickets were arrested in the melee at Gwynn Oak Park, a privately operated establishment just northwest of Baltimore.

A sixth was pounced upon and beaten by members of the mob, while two of those under arrest were assaulted by the crowd as they were being dragged from the park by police. No serious injuries were reported.

During the outbreak, about 500 persons gathered about the pickets, yelling, "Get them. * * * get a rope. * * * back to Russia."

About 40 Negro and white pickets from the Committee on Racial Equality had turned out to protest the park management's refusal to admit Negroes. Similiar protests were raised during the four previous annual "All Nations Days" celebrations, in which representatives of various nationality groups parade to the park in native costumes and display wares and foods.

Today five pickets slipped past guards and approached a booth for tickets to an amusement ride. They were surrounded by a swelling group of visitors who jeered and threatened to evict them.

Baltimore County police arrived about 10 minutes later and escorted three of the pickets out, but the other two locked arms and refused to move. Finally police dragged them to the park exit as members of the shouting mob directed glancing blows and kicks at them.

They were booked as James L. Lacy, 24, of 945 L Street NW., Washington, and Joseph C. Sheehan, 26, Baltimore.

Three who were taken out earlier were identified as Juretha Z. Joyner, Baltimore; Dale H. Drews, 23, of 512 Second Street, Washington, and Mrs. Giles E. Brown, 44, Baltimore.

All were charged with disorderly conduct.

As Lacy and Sheehan were being taken from the park, Ivor Kraft of Baltimore, 34-year-old picket, was knocked to the ground by the mob. He was struck several times on the head, his eyeglasses were knocked off and a sleeve was ripped from his shirt.

PUERTO RICAN BEATEN—SIX YOUTHS ARRESTED

NEW YORK, September 6.—Three 6-foot youths were held today on charges they beat and stomped an 18-year-old after he said he was a Puerto Rican.

Russell Brander, 16; Joseph Mills, 16; and James Brooks, 17; all white, were held in $500 bail each for a September 14 hearing.

Their victim, Hector Battista, is in a Bronx hospital with a broken nose and numerous cuts and bruises.

The attack last night in the Bronx was one of a series of incidents of juvenile violence, including four killings, which have led city and State officials to project a strong campaign against juvenile delinquency.

The playground slaying of two youths on the West Side a week ago resulted from an attack by a group of Puerto Rican youths. They reportedly had been led to believe that a gang of other national origins was out to get the Puerto Ricans.

A half-dozen youths, most of them Puerto Ricans, have been charged with homicide in the slayings.

THE CRISIS IN LAOS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the growing crisis in Laos is probably the most vivid example of the failure of America's foreign affairs resulting from a foreign aid giveaway program.

Ever since the first foreign aid program was devised I warned the Senate that we could not buy friends with money anywhere in this world. As early as June of this year I warned the Senate of the dangerous situation that was developing in southeast Asia. On July 2 I summarized the situation in Laos to the Senate and cited reports emanating from that section of the world that I thought should be given consideration. But my words went unheeded, as did the words of other Senators who saw a similar problem in southeast Asia. I wish now to reiterate some of my remarks of July 2 to the Senate. I said:

Take the country of Laos, for example. In that small nation of less than 2 million people, our foreign aid giveaway program has been handled in such a stupid manner that it is impossible for the U.S. Government to actually determine how much money went into that country.

Estimates have placed it at around $30 million for that 4-year period, but the Committee on Government Operations in its seventh report dated June 15, 1959, stated that it is impossible to determine the value of U.S. aid in dollars.

The United States, since Laos became an independent country, has supported the total military budget of that country and is, in fact, virtually supporting the entire economy, so states the Senate report. Laos is the only country in the world where the United States supports the military budget 100 percent and yet, again quoting the Senate Government Operations Committee report, our military judgments have been totally disregarded. All this financial support, etc., has been to sustain a 25,000-man army and to maintain the financial stability of the country.

Mr. President, I charge that a 25,000-man army in Laos could not hold back a single attack from the Red Chinese hordes if they ever decided to go into that country, and certainly a 25,000-man army against a nation of over 600 million people is not frightening anybody from making such an invasion.

The truth is that all this money for military and economic assistance has accomplished little or nothing in Laos or in any other southeast Asian country, and I doubt if in any foreign country.

Mr. President, those words were mine of several months ago. They are not hindsight after the tragedy. Laos is incapable of defending itself and we are going to the United Nations for assistance and I presume we will wind up sending Marines and other men and equipment to save Laos. It will be the stark tragedy of Korea all over again.

Mr. President, I pray that a peaceful solution can be reached and I take no glee in rehashing my old warning. I can think of nothing more horrible and tragic than any type of fighting. War, in any form, destroys lives and is depressing upon the morale of the world.

But, on the realistic side of this situation, I believe anyone should be able to see that the $30 million we poured into Laos and the other advice and counsel that we have given that nation in our foreign aid program, which I call the "giveaway America" program, we have accomplished nothing in Laos. In the first place, if we had simply guaranteed that country military assistance in case of invasion and not spent one nickel, we would not be any worse off today. In fact, that money could have been spent on America's own military program and we would know that it was spent properly.

During the years that we sent all that money and equipment and advice to Laos, not one single time did that country follow our military advice even though we supported its military program 100 percent. It is the only nation where we totally supported a country's military budget. Its 25,000-man army is practically helpless against the guerrilla warfare being brought on by Red China. This is the stupidity contained in our foreign aid giveaway program and I hope the Senate will never be called upon to vote another dollar to go into such programs that never can cope with the communistic aggression. If we must spend money on military might, let us spend it building up America's military machinery and not throw it away where we have no control over what it is used for.

I think the speech I made on that day is now showing to the Nation and to the world that we cannot buy our friendship with other nations.

VOTING RIGHTS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, an editorial entitled "Precarious Right," published in the Washington Post and Times-Herald this morning, cites figures from a survey made by the Southern Regional Council which states that Negroes are behind whites in registering for voting purposes in several Southern States.

Of course, the Southern Regional Council, an organization which I would call leftwing, to say the least, is attempting to state that because Negro registration is lagging behind white registration that there is some sort of clandestine efforts by officials of the Southern States to prevent Negroes from registering.

This is an out and out slanderous insinuation and I charge that it is an attempt by the Southern Regional Council to intimidate Congress and to unjustly accuse the Southern States.

Mr. President, I hold no brief with the Washington Post and Times Herald for it has only based its editorial upon figures released by the Southern Regional Council, but I wish to point out to the Post and Times Herald and to the Members of the Senate that the Southern Regional Council is a prejudiced organization which has no official standing, holding to preconceived ideas regarding integration and civil rights matters.

I can only speak for South Carolina which is mentioned in the editorial, for that is my State. I dare the Southern Regional Council, the Washington Post and Times Herald, or any others interested in the voting rights of the people of my State to find, name, and bring to the front, any citizen, black or white, who has been intimidated, coerced, or for similar reason kept from registering to vote. South Carolina has simple requirements for registering to vote. There are no gimmicks or tricks in the book and our State is proud of the fact that everyone legally qualified can vote. When registration time rolls around in South Carolina anyone can go to any courthouse in the State and find Negroes lined up to register and they are registered.

Mr. President, the true reason why registration is behind or has dropped from 1956 to 1958 is because of this:

South Carolina has a registration law requiring that voters reregister every 10 years. Nineteen hundred and fifty-eight was the anniversary date for reregistration; therefore, automatically everyone, regardless of race, creed, or color, who had previously been registered was dropped from the books until they reregistered. This system is to give the State some check against misuse of old registration certificates of deceased persons and those who may have moved from the State, and so forth. Mr. President, it stands to reason that when you enter upon a new registration period that there will be a significant drop in the number of persons registered during the first year.

I do not know if this same situation exists in other States in the South but I suggest that Congress go upon the official records of the States to determine voting conditions in the various States and not upon the figures and presumptions of some leftwing group such as the Southern Regional Council. The official records of the States are available from the secretaries of state of the various States and I intend to get South Carolina's record and present it to the Senate as soon as possible.

Mr. President, there is no "foot lagging" on Capitol Hill such as charged by the Washington Post and Times Herald. We are engaged upon a lengthy and detailed study of problems surrounding civil rights legislation, as the Senate conducted a lengthy and detailed study into the problems entailed in using water from the Great Lakes last week.

Mr. President, in order that the Senate may have the benefit of everything said in the editorial I mentioned, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Washington Post and Times Herald, Sept. 7, 1959]

PRECARIOUS RIGHT

A survey of Negro voting in the South conducted by the Southern Regional Council underscores with stark, incontrovertible figures the urgent need for civil rights legislation in the present session of Congress. The council study shows that in eight states of the Deep South—Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia—the number of Negroes registered to vote dropped by 45,845 from 1956 to 1958. An estimated 25 percent of the eligible Negroes are registered in the South as compared with 60 percent of the white citizens of voting age.

When one considers the obstacles that have been put in the way of Negro voting in the South, the fact that more than a million Negroes have registered is a tribute to their courage and their sense of citizenship. They have registered in spite of poll taxes, in spite of literacy tests administered with gross discrimination, in spite of the hostility of registrars and in spite of threats of violence and other forms of intimidation. The right to vote must be looked upon as precious indeed by those who face such perils to exercise it.

It is, of course, the fundamental right of American citizenship—a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. And this is why the Government of the United States must not fail or falter in protecting it. There can be no doubt of the need to require States to keep registration and voting records—and to afford the Attorney General ready access to those records so that Federal protection of the right to vote can be made effective. This is a minimum requirement of civil rights legislation. It ought to be operative before the next election despite the foot dragging so apparent on Capitol Hill.

REPORT OF U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS, 1959

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield me 1 minute?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Mississippi desires to place some material in the RECORD and assures me he will not take more than 2 minutes. Provided I do not lose my right to the floor, I yield to that purpose.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, late last week the Commission on Civil Rights issued a 38-page printed document entitled "Excerpts From Report of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1959."

It is clear to me, and should be clear to everyone, that even the sponsors of the recommendations in the report realize and know that under the Constitution of the United States their proposals are grossly void and unconstitutional.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD excerpts from the report of the Commission which were issued late last week, together with a statement by me on this subject.

There being no objection, the excerpts and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REPORT OF THE U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS, 1959

VOTING: FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS—THE PROBLEM

"To secure these rights," declared the great charter of American liberty, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The instrument by which consent is given or withheld is the ballot.

Few Americans would deny, at least in theory, the right of all qualified citizens to vote. A significant number, however, differ as to which citizens are qualified. None in good conscience can state that the goal of universal adult suffrage has been achieved. Many Americans, even today, are denied the franchise because of race. This is accomplished through the creation of legal impediments, administrative obstacles, and positive discouragement engendered by fears of economic reprisal and physical harm. With those Americans who of their own volition are too apathetic either to register or, once registered, too apathetic to vote, this report does not concern itself. But with denials of the right to vote because of race, color, religion, or national origin, this Commission and the Congress of the United States are urgently concerned.

The Commission's studies reveal that many Negroes are eager to exercise their political rights as free Americans and that they have made some progress. Our investigations have revealed further that many Negro American citizens find it difficult, and often impossible, to vote. An attempt has been made to gather and assess statistics and facts regarding denial of the right to vote. This task has required careful analysis and understanding of the legal impediments.

The Commission has sought to evaluate the extent to which there is an obligation on the part of the Federal Government to prevent denial of the right to vote because of discrimination by reason of color, race, religion, or national origin. This is what Congress asked. The scope of Federal power to protect the suffrage depends on whether interference comes from State and local officers or from private persons; on whether improper voting procedure alone is involved, or whether the interference is based on race or color, and on the nature of the election itself, whether State or National.

Article I, section 2, of the U.S. Constitution has long stood for the proposition that while the qualifications of electors of Members of Congress are governed by State law, the right to vote for such Representatives is derived from the U.S. Constitution. Article I, section 4, authorizes Federal protection of voting in Federal elections against interference from any source. The 14th amendment affords protection against State interference with the equality of opportunity to vote in any election. The 15th amendment prohibits any action by the United States or a State in any election, which interferes with the right to vote because of race or color or previous condition of servitude. The 17th amendment provides that a person possessing State qualifications has a right to vote which is derived not merely from the constitution or the laws of the State from which the Senator is chosen, but has its foundation in the Constitution of the United States. The 19th amendment supports action in any election against State interference with the right to vote because of sex.

On many occasions our Nation has found it necessary to review the state of the civil rights of its people. During the period 1776 through 1791 civil rights were of prime concern in the drafting of the Declaration of Independence, the writing of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. A new concept of liberty emerged. It was almost immediately challenged by the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. Then, prior to, during, and after the War Between the States an appraisal of civil rights culminated in the adoption of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments. The most recent review prior to 1957 was initiated by Executive Order 9808 promulgated by President Harry S. Truman on December 5, 1946, establishing the President's Committee on Civil Rights. This culminated in the 1947 report of the Committee entitled "To Secure These Rights." Many recommendations were made in the voting field. Twelve years have passed since that report was issued. Without attempting to evaluate specific changes other than those reflected in the body of our report on voting, it has become apparent that legislation presently on the books is inadequate to assure that all our qualified citizens shall enjoy the right to vote. There exists here a striking gap between our principles and our everyday practices. This is a moral gap. It spills over into and vitiates other areas of our society. It runs counter to our traditional concepts of fairplay. It is a partial repudiation of our faith in the democratic system. It undermines the moral suasion of our national stand in international affairs. It reduces the productivity of our Nation. In the belief that new legislation is needed, we submit for consideration of the President and the Congress the following recommendations which we believe will help Americans to make good our declarations of national purpose.

Background: The Commission study of voting revealed that information on voting turnout in the United States is incomplete. Data on voting turnout among specific racial groups, particularly on a comparative basis for States or sections, was impossible to obtain except for fragmentary material provided by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan, Elmo Roper and Associates, and the Gallup Organization. Official State sources are of only limited help. Some States report total registration figures, in some cases broken down by counties. Other States do not report such figures. To know the extent of nonvoting requires a standard, and the one usually adopted is the potential vote, that is, the total number of citizens of voting age. This is an inexact standard because, in any year, millions of citizens are ineligible to vote because of State residence and other requirements. If it were possible to have reliable registration figures, State by State and county by county, the computation of voting turnout among those qualified to vote would be simple. Millions of citizens are eligible to register but neglect to do so and their number can be more accurately estimated if reliable registration figures are available.

Findings: The Commission finds that there is a general deficiency of information pertinent to the phenomenon of nonvoting. There is a general lack of reliable information on voting according to race, color, or national origin, and there is no single repository of the fragmentary information available. The lack of this kind of information presents real difficulties in any undertaking such as this Commission's.

Recommenedation No. 1: Therefore, the Commission recommends, that the Bureau of the Census be authorized and directed to undertake, in connection with the census of 1960 or at the earliest possible time thereafter, a nationwide and territorial compilation of registration and voting statistics which shall include a count of individuals by race, color, and national origin who are registered, and a determination of the extent to which such individuals have voted since the prior decennial census.

Availability of voting records

Background: In its effort to discharge its duty to "investigate" formal complaints of denial of the right to vote by reason of race and color, the Commission found it necessary to examine the registration and voting records kept by local officials pursuant to provisions of State law. In both Alabama and Louisiana, the two States which led in the number of voting complaints received by the Commission, the Commission and its staff encountered obstacles in its effort to examine records. These obstacles were erected upon existing State laws, or interpretations thereof, by State officials; they were at least partially effective as a deterrent to the Commission's discharge of its duty.

Specifically, officials of the State of Alabama interpreted constitutional provisions vesting adjudicatory powers in boards of registrars to pass upon applications as precluding examination thereof by a nonjudicial body of the Federal Government. This interpretation was held to be without merit by the Federal courts. Alabama officials further interpreted custodial and repository provisions of State law as precluding production of the records at the Commission's hearing. By compromise agreement, some of the records were examined by the Commission staff after the hearing.

Officials of the State of Louisiana interpreted provisions for examination of the State registration and voting records as prohibiting such examination by the Commission staff. This interpretation, similar to the Alabama refusal, necessitated exercise of the Commission's subpena power, and unnecessarily delayed the Commission's efforts to evaluate the merits of the complaints in both States.

Furthermore, after records in only one-half of the counties being investigated in Alabama had been examined, the State legislature passed a bill which permits the destruction of application forms of persons denied registration. Such forms are essential to any investigation of denials of the right to vote.

Findings: The Commission finds that lack of uniform provision for the preservation and public inspection of all records pertaining to registration and voting hampers and impedes investigation of alleged denials of the right to vote by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin.

Recommendation No. 2: Therefore, the Commission recommends that the Congress require that all State and Territorial registration and voting records shall be public records and must be preserved for a period of 5 years, during which time they shall be subject to public inspection, provided that all care be taken to preserve the secrecy of the ballot.

Background: Complaints were frequently made that State officials charged with responsibility to register qualified persons as electors evaded this responsibility, in the case of persons of a particular race or color, by inaction. Such practices are beyond the effective reach of the present remedial provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

Specifically, the Commission found that boards of registrars in both Bullock and Macon Counties in Alabama frequently did not function as boards to register Negro applicants on scheduled dates for registration. Furthermore, in these same two counties, on several different occasions, one or more members of such boards—always in sufficient numbers to preclude the existence of the majority required for approval of registration—resigned their posts. And further, State officials responsible for appointing members of boards of registrars repeatedly have delayed such appointments when boards became inoperative through resignation.

Findings: The Commission finds that the lack of an affirmative duty to constitute boards of registrars, or failure to discharge or enforce such duty under State law, and the failure of such boards to function on particular occasions or for long periods of time, or to restrict periods of function to such limited periods of time as to make it impossible for most citizens to register, are devices by which the right to vote is denied to citizens of the United States by reason of their race or color. It further finds that such failure to act is arbitrary, capricious, and without legal cause or justification.

Recommendation No. 3: Therefore, the Commission recommends that part IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1971) shall be amended by insertion of the following paragraph after the first paragraph in section 1971(b):

"Nor shall any person or group of persons, under color of State law, arbitrarily and without legal justification or cause, act, or being under duty to act, fail to act, in such manner as to deprive or threaten to deprive any individual or group of individuals of the opportunity to register, vote and have that vote counted for any candidate for the Office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate, or Member of the House of Representatives, Delegate or Commissioner for the Territories or possessions, at any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any such candidate."

Background: In the course of conducting voting hearings in Montgomery, Ala., in December 1958, the Commission was impressed with the fact that its purposes were not fully realized because of the divided authority for compelling the production of registration records. The Commission can subpena such records but the initiative rests with the Attorney General to petition the court to order a contumacious witness to comply with a Commission subpena. Such divided responsibility is unusual. These situations require rapid, coordinated action and communication. Both are difficult to achieve when there is dual responsibility and operation.

Findings: The Commission finds that the necessity for securing the aid and cooperation of a separate agency of the Federal Government in order to discharge the Commission's responsibility under law is a needlessly cumbersome procedure. It is not a sound system of administration. Full and effective implementation of Commission policy in the discharge of Commission responsibilities under law requires full and exclusive control of any necessary resort to the courts by the Commission itself.

Recommendation No. 4: Therefore, the Commission recommends that in cases of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued by the Commission on Civil Rights (under sec. 105(f) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957) for the attendance and testimony of witnesses or the production of written or other matter, the Commission should be empowered to apply directly to the appropriate U.S. district court for an order enforcing such subpena.

Appointment of temporary Federal registrars

Background: The Commission has investigated sworn complaints of denials of the right to vote by reason of color or race in seven States. In two States where it determined to hold formal hearings, Alabama and Louisiana, its efforts to secure all relevant facts were met with open resistance by State officials. Nevertheless, on the basis of the testimony of witnesses and the examination of the registration records that were made available in Alabama, and through field investigation in other States, the Commission found that a substantial number of Negroes are being denied their right to vote. The infringement of this right is usually accomplished through discriminatory application and administration of State registration laws.

But discriminatory registration is not the only problem. The Commission also found instances in which there was no registration board in existence, or none capable of functioning lawfully. In all such cases, the majority of the electorate already registered were white persons.

For one example, the members of the Macon County, Ala., Board of Registrars resigned after this Commission's Alabama hearing. At the hearing, 25 Macon County Negroes had testified that the board had unlawfully refused to register them. Invited to answer these charges, the Macon County registrars had refused to testify. But an injunction suit against the board to compel registration of 17 of the hearing witnesses and other apparently qualified Negroes, brought by the U.S. Attorney General under the new provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, was dismissed for lack of anyone to sue. Subsequently, new appointees to the Macon County board were named in July 1959. They refused to serve. Their reason, according to a United Press International report, was "the pressure for Negro registration" and "fear of being 'hounded' by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission."

The two other suits brought by the Attorney General under the same act had not at this writing resulted in a single registration. The suit in Georgia had been dismissed and was on appeal; the one in Louisiana was pending.

In short, no one had yet been registered through the civil remedies of the 1957 act.

Class suits on behalf of a number of Negroes to obtain registration have rarely been successful. The courts have inclined to the view that these suits are of an individual nature, with the result that a vast number of suits may be necessary.

The delays inherent in litigation, and the real possibility that in the end litigation will prove fruitless because the registrars have resigned make necessary further remedial action by Congress if many qualified citizens are not to be denied their constitutional rights to vote in the 1960 elections.

Findings: The Commission finds that substantial numbers of citizens qualified to vote under State registration and election laws are being denied the right to register, and thus the right to vote, by reason of their race or color. It finds that the existing remedies under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 are insufficient to secure and protect the right to vote of such citizens. It further finds that some direct procedure for temporary Federal registration for Federal elections is required if these citizens are not to be denied their right to register and vote in forthcoming national elections. Some method must be found by which a Federal officer is empowered to register voters for Federal elections who are qualified under State registration laws but are otherwise unable to register.

Such a temporary Federal registrar should serve only until local officials are prepared to register voters without discrimination. The temporary Federal registrar should be an individual located in the area involved, such as the postmaster, U.S. attorney, or clerk of the Federal district court. The factfinding responsibilities to determine whether reasonable grounds exist, to believe that the right to vote is being denied could be discharged by the Commission on Civil Rights, if extended. Because of the importance of the matter, such a temporary Federal registrar should be appointed directly by the President of the United States.

Recommendation No. 5: Therefore, it is recommended that, upon receipt by the President of the United States of sworn affidavits by nine or more individuals from any district, county, parish, or other recognized political subdivision of a State, alleging that the affiants have unsuccessfully attempted to register with the duly constituted State registration office, and that the affiants believe themselves qualified under State law to be electors, but have been denied the right to register because of race, color, religion, or national origin, the President shall refer such affidavits to the Commission on Civil Rights, if extended.

(A) The Commission shall (1) investigate the validity of the allegations; (2) dismiss such affidavits as prove, on investigation, to be unfounded; (3) certify any and all well-founded affidavits to the President and to such temporary registrar as he may designate.

(B) The President upon such certification shall designate an existing Federal officer or employee in the area from which complaints are received, to act as a temporary registrar.

(C) Such registrar-designate shall administer the State qualification laws and issue to all individuals found qualified, registration certificates which shall entitle them to vote for any candidate for the Federal office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Members of the Senate or Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates or Commissioners for the Territories or possessions, in any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any such candidate.

(D) The registrar-designate shall certify to the responsible State registration officials the names and fact of registration of all persons registered by him. Such certification shall permit all such registrants to participate in Federal elections previously enumerated.

(E) Jurisdiction shall be retained until such time as the President determines that the presence of the appointed registrar is no longer necessary.

Dissent by Commissioner Battle: I concur in the proposition that all properly qualified American citizens should have the right to vote but I believe the present laws are sufficient to protect that right and I disagree with the proposal for the appointment of a Federal registrar which would place in the hands of the Federal Government a vital part of the election process so jealously guarded and carefully reserved to the States by the Founding Fathers.

PROPOSAL FOR A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE

(By Chairman Hannah and Commissioners Hesburgh and Johnson:)

The Commission's recommendation for temporary Federal registration should, if enacted by Congress, secure the right to vote in the forthcoming national elections for many qualified citizens who would otherwise, because of their race or color, be denied this most fundamental of American civil rights. But the proposed measure is clearly a stopgap.

In its investigations, hearings, and studies the Commission has seen that complex voter qualification laws, including tests of literacy, education and "interpretation," have been used and may readily be used arbitrarily to deny the right to vote to citizens of the United States.

Most denials of the right to vote are in fact accomplished through the discriminatory application and administration of such State laws. The difficulty of proving discrimination in any particular case is considerable. It appears to be impossible to enforce an impartial administration of the literacy tests now in force in some States, for where there is a will to discriminate, these tests provide the way.

Therefore, as the best ultimate solution of the problem of securing and protecting the right to vote, we propose a constitutional amendment to establish a free and universal franchise throughout the United States.

An important aim of this amendment would be to remove the occasion for further direct Federal intervention in the States' administration and conduct of elections, by prohibiting complex voting requirements and providing clear, simple, and easily enforceable standards.

The proposed constitutional amendment would give the right to vote to every citizen who meets his State's age and residence requirements and who is not legally confined at the time of registration or election.

Age and residence are objective and simple standards. With only such readily ascertainable standards to be met, the present civil remedies of the Civil Rights Act should prove more effective in any future cases of discriminatory application. A court injunction could require the immediate registration of any person who meets these clear-cut State qualifications.

The proposed amendment is in harmony with the American tradition and with the trend in the whole democratic world. As noted in the beginning of this section of the Commission's report, the growth of American democracy has been marked by a steady expansion of the franchise; first by the abandonment of property qualifications and then by conferral of suffrage upon the two great disfranchised groups, Negroes and women. Only 19 States now require that voters demonstrate their literacy. Michigan, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Vermont have suffered no apparent harm from absence of the common provisions disqualifying mental incompetents. With minor exceptions, mostly involving election offenses, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Utah, Vermont, and West Virginia have no provisions barring certain ex-convicts from the vote, and of the States which do have such provisions, all but eight also provide for restoration of the former felon's civil rights. In only five States is the payment of a poll tax still a condition upon the suffrage.

The number of Americans disqualified under each of these categories is very small compared with the approximately 90 million now normally qualified to vote. It is also small in relation to the numbers of qualified nonwhite citizens presently being disfranchised by the discriminatory application of these complex laws. The march of education has almost eliminated illiteracy. In a nation dedicated to the full development of every citizen's human potential, there is no excuse for whatever illiteracy that may remain. Ratification of the proposed amendment would, we believe, provide an additional incentive for its total elimination. Meanwhile, abundant information about political candidates and issues is available to all by way of television and radio.

We believe that the time has come for the United States to take the last of its many steps toward free and universal suffrage. The ratification of this amendment would be a reaffirmation of our faith in the principles upon which this Nation was founded. It would reassure lovers of freedom throughout a world in which hundreds of millions of peopie, most of them colored, are becoming free and are hesitating between alternative paths of national development.

For all these reasons we propose the following 23d amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE XXIII

"Section 1

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State or by any person for any cause except inability to meet State age or length-of-residence requirements uniformly applied to all persons within the State, or legal confinement at the time of registration or election. This right to vote shall include the right to register or otherwise qualify to vote, and to have one's vote counted.

"Section 2

"The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

SEPARATE STATEMENT REGARDING PROPOSED 23D AMENDMENT

(By Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioner Carlton:)

We strongly believe in the right of every qualified citizen of the United States, irrespective of his color, race, religion, or national origin, to register, vote, and have his vote counted. We regard full protection of these rights of suffrage by both State and Federal Governments necessary and proper. Therefore, we have supported and voted for all recommendations of the Commission (except the proposed 23d amendment) to strengthen the laws and improve the administration of registration and voting procedures. However, we cannot join our distinguished colleagues in the recommendation of the proposed constitutional amendment. These are our several reasons:

1. We believe that our Commission recommendations, if enacted into law and properly enforced, will eliminate most if not all of the restrictions on registration and voting by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin.

A recommendation proposing a constitutional amendment granting additional power to the Federal Government would be in order only if we had found a lack of power under existing constitutional provisions. Such is not the case.

2. On principle, proposals for constitutional amendments which would alter longstanding Federal-State relationships, such as the constitutional provision that matters pertaining to the qualifications of electors shall be left to the several States, should not be proposed in the absence of clear proof that no other action will correct an existing evil. No such proof is apparent.

3. The Constitution of the United States of America presently includes sufficient authority to the Federal Government to enable it effectively to deal with denials of the right to vote by reason of race, color, religion, and national origin.

4. The information and findings cited in support of the proposed 23d amendment disclose that some illiteracy still exists, that authoritative State statistics and studies are wholly lacking to support such an important proposal, and that our staff has not had the opportunity to make a thorough study of such a far-reaching proposal.

"I heartily agree with the objections of Commissioners Storey and Carlton to the proposed constitutional amendment." (John S. Battle, Commissioner.)

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has announced its general policy on grants to noncompliant schools as follows:

"(1) Under the Supreme Court decision on segregation in reference to public elementary and secondary education, it is the Federal judiciary, and not the executive branch of the Federal Government, which is to determine how compliance with the Supreme Court mandate is to be brought about and what constitutes compliance in good faith.

"(2) Judicial implementation of the Supreme Court decision, in the manner charted by the Court in its decree, and the meeting of the urgent, overall educational needs of our country, can go forward at the same time.

"(3) For the executive branch to exercise the power, on the basis of its own determinations as to the requirements of the Supreme Court mandate, to reserve or withhold funds necessary to progress in meeting educational needs, might interfere with such progress and would in the long run interfere with the responsibilities of the Federal judiciary."

The chief and perhaps only Federal aid disbursed directly to designated institutions of higher education by statutory directive goes to land-grant colleges and universities under the Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones Acts.

The statute authorizing financial assistance to these State colleges and universities seems to be the only one governing Federal educational grants that specifically forbids racial discrimination. But it further provides that this requirement may be satisfied by separate colleges for white and colored students. This provision was, of course, nullified by the school decision of 1954—which, the Supreme Court later made clear, definitely applies to tax-supported institutions of higher education.

By September 1958 more than half of the 208 white public colleges and universities in the 17 segregating States had admitted Negro students. But among the colleges and universities which had not done so were all those in Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, and (except for one Negro matriculant who was promptly expelled) Alabama. Yet these latter were still receiving their land-grant payments from the U.S. Government.

And these and many other colleges and universities, public and private, were still receiving a multiplicity of other Federal grants. Among them were a number whose admission policies were at least suspect of being in violation of the Supreme Court decision of 1954.

EDUCATION: THE PROBLEM—FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

In 1954 the Supreme Court of the United States held that compulsory racial segregation in public schools is a denial of the equal protection of the laws under the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and of the due process of law required by the 5th amendment. In so holding, the Court did not require racial integration in the schools. What the Court did hold is that publicly supported schools must be opened to all races on a nonsegregated basis.

The requirements of this declaration of constitutional principle have been stated clearly by the late Judge John J. Parker of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in the case of Briggs v. Elliott.

"What it (the Supreme Court) has decided, and all that it has decided, is that a State many not deny to any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains. This, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the State may not do directly or indirectly; but if the schools which it maintains are open to children of all races, no violation of the Constitution is involved even though the children of different races voluntarily attend different schools, as they attend different churches (132 F. Supp. 776 (1955))."

The Commission based its study of legal developments constituting a denial of the equal protection of the laws in the field of public education upon two fundamental premises:

(1) The American system of public education must be preserved without impairment because an educated citizenry is the mainstay of the Republic and full educational opportunity for each and every citizen is America's major defense against the world threat to freedom.

(2) The constitutional right to be free from compulsory segregation in public education can be and must be realized, for this is a government of law, and the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court is the supreme law of the land.

The problem, therefore, is how to comply with the Supreme Court decision while preserving and even improving public education. The ultimate choice of each State is between finding reasonable ways of ending compulsory segregation in its schools or abandoning its system of free public education.

Information, advisory, and conciliation services

Background: The Commission's studies, and particularly its conference with school officials from districts in border States and a few in the South that have in some measure desegregated since 1954, demonstrate that when local school officials are permitted to act responsibly in adopting plans that fit local conditions the difficulties of desegregation can be minimized. A variety of plans have proved to be successful, ranging from the merger of the former Negro and white school systems into one integrated system (particularly in communities where the Negro population was small and the cost of maintaining separate systems considerable) to the gradual Nashville plan that began in the first grade and is proceeding at the rate of one grade a year, with voluntary transfer permitted to any child assigned to a school where his race is in the minority.

In Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham Board of Education, 358 U.S. 101 (1958) the U.S. Supreme Court upheld as valid on its face the Alabama pupil placement law on the assumption that the law would be administered in a constitutional manner. Eight Southern States have adopted pupil placement laws as a means of meeting the test of nondiscrimination. This is another possible method by which compliance may be achieved.

In many instances desegregation has been used by the local community as the occasion to raise its educational standards. In many instances remedial programs have been adopted for the handicapped, and advanced programs established for gifted students. Such programs were described to the Commission at its Nashville conference by the superintendents from Wilmington, Del.; Washington, D.C.; and San Angelo, Tex. St. Louis, Mo., has adopted a similar program. It is important that any transition should not result in the lowering of educational standards for either the white or Negro students. If possible, it should result in an improvement of educational standards for both; a number of school officials report that this has already happened in their communities.

In the transition to a nondiscriminatory school system, a carefully developed State or local plan is better than a plan imposed by a court for the immediate admission of certain litigants, or a plan imposed by any outside agency. The Supreme Court and the Federal lower courts have made it clear that they will consider sympathetically any reasonable plan proposed in good faith. This seems to be an area in which the principle of State's rights can most effectively express itself through local option in meeting this problem. If State governments do not permit local school officials to develop such plans for good faith compliance, the effectiveness of the school system in the State as a whole will be impaired. By permitting such local option a variety of methods of transition can be developed that take into account the varying circumstances in different areas of the State.

Findings:

1. The ease of adjustment of a school system to desegregation is influenced by many factors including the relative size and location of the white and Negro population, the extent to which the Negro children are culturally handicapped, segregation practices in other areas of community life, the presence or absence of democratic participation in the planning of the program used or preparation of the community for its acceptance, and the character of the leadership in the community and State.

2. Many factors must be considered and weighed in determining what constitutes a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance and the means by which and the rate at which desegregation should be accomplished.

3. Desegregation by court order has been notably more difficult than desegregation by voluntary action wherein the method and timing have been locally determined.

4. Many school districts in attempting to evolve a desegregation plan have had no established and qualified source to which to turn for information and advice. Furthermore, many of these districts have been confused and frustrated by apparent inconsistencies in decisions of lower Federal courts.

Recommendations No. 1(a) and 1(b): Therefore, the Commission recommends: 1(a) That the President propose and the Congress enact legislation to authorize the Commission on Civil Rights, if extended, to serve as a clearinghouse to collect and make available to States and to local communities information concerning programs and procedures used by school districts to comply with the Supreme Court mandate either voluntarily or by court order, including data as to the known effects of the programs on the quality of education and the cost thereof.

1(b) That the Commission on Civil Rights be authorized to establish an advisory and conciliation service to assist local school officials in developing plans designed to meet constitutional requirements and local conditions; and to mediate and conciliate, upon request, disputes as to proposed plans and their implementation.

Annual school census

Background: The primary problem of equal protection of the laws in the field of public education is desegregation of public school systems in which separate schools for white and Negro children have been maintained by compulsion of State law. The Commission's study of this problem necessarily required public school enrollment figures, by race of students and type of school attended, for all school districts in the 17 States and the District of Columbia where compulsory segregation had been the rule.

The Commission found that the U.S. Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, which formerly collected and published such information, ceased doing so with the school year 1953–54. It was necessary, therefore, to secure such data directly from State and local officials or from secondary sources. As a matter of policy the keeping of records by race has been discontinued in the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia, and in some parts of Maryland.

A study such as that of the Commission requires complete and authoritative factual data. But because there is a possibility that school records of the race of students might be used in a discriminatory manner in recommendations to colleges and universities and to prospective employers, the Commission cannot request the maintenance of permanent school records by race.

Findings:

1. No agency of the U.S. Government, other than this Commission, has collected data either on public school enrollment by race since the school year 1953–54, or on the existence of segregation or nonsegregation by policy or practice in the public schools of the Nation.

2. The public school study of the Commission has been rendered difficult by the lack of such information within the Federal Government and by the policy, adopted by some States and school districts that maintained racially segregated schools immediately prior to May 17, 1954, to discontinue recording the race of pupils.

Recommendation No. 2: Therefore, the Commission recommends: That the Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, in cooperation with the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce, conduct an annual school census that will show the number and race of all students enrolled in all public educational institutions in the United States, and compile such data by States, by school districts, and by individual institutions of higher education within each State. Further, that initially this data be collected at the time of the taking of the next decennial census, and thereafter from official State sources insofar as possible.[1]

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT ON EDUCATION

(By Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton:)

Although the portion of the report dealing with public education contains much interesting material, the text preceding the findings and recommendations is to a large extent argumentative and colored by the author's views of the sociological and philosophical aspects of the school integration problem. It is based largely upon information supplied by school officials from five large "border" cities which have integrated their schools. These officials appear to take pride in their accomplishment and constitute special pleaders for their cause. Little acknowledgment has been given to different conditions found in large areas of the country where the problem is most acute.

[1] Commissioner JOHNSON. I have agreed to this recommendation with the understanding that it does not suggest or require that public educational institutions maintain school records by race and that the recommended school census can be taken without the maintenance of such records.

Further study and investigation should be made of the areas where school integration efforts run counter to long-established customs and traditions that formerly had legal sanction.

This tremendously serious and complex problem will not be solved by hasty action but must have the most careful and sympathetic consideration, with due regard for the way of life of large numbers of loyal Americans.

PROPOSAL TO REQUIRE EQUAL OPPORTUNITY AS A CONDITION OF FEDERAL GRANTS TO HIGHER EDUCATION

(By Chairman Hannah and Commissioners Hesburgh and Johnson:)

More than $2 billion a year of Federal funds go for educational purposes and to educational institutions. The principal recipients of these funds are the Nation's colleges, universities, and other institutions of higher education. Whether tax-supported or privately financed, they receive Federal grants and loans both for their general support and capital improvements as well as for research projects, special programs, and institutes.

Discriminatory admission policies and other practices are known to exist in a number of such institutions. None of the Federal agencies administering these educational assistance programs require proof or an attestation of nondiscrimination by the institutions as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds.

With its duty to "appraise the laws and policies of the Federal Government with respect to equal protection of the laws under the Constitution," the Commission was compelled to ask whether it is consistent for the Federal Government to aid and support educational programs and activities in institutions of higher education which are not open to all citizens on an equal and nondiscriminatory basis.

While Congress has not required such conditions for these grants, the operations of the Federal Government are subject to the constitutional principle of equal protection or equal treatment.

The Supreme Court has held racial discrimination in public education to be a denial of equal protection. In regard to public institutions of higher education the courts required the immediate admission of qualified students without discrimination. The reasons for the gradual elimination of racial discrimination in elementary and secondary schools do not obtain in the field of higher education. There, immediate equality of opportunity for qualified students of all races is possible and necessary.

Although the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment applies only to State action, "it would be unthinkable," the Supreme Court has held, "that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government."

We believe that it is inconsistent with the Constitution and public policy of the United States for the Federal Government to grant financial assistance to institutions of higher education that practice racial discrimination.

We recommend that Federal agencies act in accordance with the fundamental constitutional principle of equal protection and equal treatment, and that these agencies be authorized and directed to withhold funds in any form to institutions of higher learning, both publicly supported and privately supported, which refuse, on racial grounds, to admit students otherwise qualified for admission.

Additional proposal by Commissioner Johnson

While joining in the above proposal, I recommend that the policy set forth apply to all educational institutions that receive Federal funds, including public elementary and secondary schools. My reasons are set forth in my closing statement at the end of this report.

SEPARATE STATEMENT ON CONDITIONAL FEDERAL GRANTS FOR HIGHER EDUCATION

(By Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton:)

We oppose the recommendation that Federal agencies be authorized to withhold all public funds from institutions of higher learning (public and private) which refuse, on racial grounds, to admit students otherwise qualified for admission for the following reasons:

1. The Commission has agreed that the preservation and improvement of education is a matter of great national interest, and is a fundamental principle within which the problems of equal protection must be evaluated. Therefore, we cannot conscientiously endorse a program which might well undermine that principle.

2. Present problems of equal protection pertaining to education fall within the sweep of the 14th amendment, an area long since preempted by the courts. We cannot endorse a program of economic coercion as either a substitute for or a supplement to the direct enforcement of the law through the orderly processes of justice, as administered by the courts.

3. Such a proposal by this Commission—as a branch of the Federal Government—would drastically affect the administration of privately owned institutions of higher education. Such action goes beyond the scope of the Commission's duties.

4. Our staff studies were directed toward understanding and evaluation of equal protection problems in public and secondary schools, not private schools upon any level, and not institutions of higher education, whether public or private.

HOUSING: FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS—THE PROBLEM

It is the public policy of the United States, declared by the Congress and the President and in accord with the declared purposes of the Constitution, that every American family shall have equal opportunity to secure a decent home in a good neighborhood. Since the home is the heart of a good society it is essential that this aspect of the promise of equal protection of the laws be fulfilled forthwith.

From the Commission's study of housing two basic facts were found to constitute the central problem.

First, a considerable number of Americans, by reason of their color or race, are being denied equal opportunity in housing. A large proportion of colored Americans are living in overcrowded slums or blighted areas in restricted sections of our cities, with little or no access to new housing or to suburban areas. Most of these Americans, regardless of their educational, economic, or professional accomplishments, have no alternative but to live in used dwellings originally occupied by white Americans who have a free choice of housing, new or old. Housing thus seems to be the one commodity in the American market that is not freely available on equal terms to everyone who can afford to pay. It would be an affront to human dignity for any one group of Americans to be restricted to wearing only hand-me-down clothing or to eating the leftovers of others' food. Like food and clothing, housing is an essential of life, yet many nonwhite American families have no choice but secondhand homes. The results can be seen in high rates of disease, fire, juvenile delinquency, crime and social demoralization among those forced to live in such conditions. A nation dedicated to respect for the human dignity of every individual should not permit such conditions to continue.

Second, the housing disabilities of colored Americans are part of a national housing crisis involving a general shortage of low-cost housing. Americans of lower income, both colored and white, have fewer opportunities for decent homes in good neighborhoods. Since most suburban housing is beyond their means, they remain crowded in the central city, creating new slums. Since colored people comprise a rising proportion of the city dwellers with lowest income, these slums are becoming increasingly colored. The population of metropolitan areas, already comprising over 60 percent of the American people, is growing rapidly not merely by births but by migration. These migrants, many of them colored, most of them unadapted to urban life, form the cutting edge of the housing crisis.

From these facts it is evident that for decent homes in good neighborhoods to be available for all Americans, two things must happen: the housing shortage for all lower income Americans must be relieved, and equality of opportunity to good housing must be secured for colored Americans. If racial discrimination is ended but adequate low-cost housing is not available, most colored Americans will remain confined in spreading slums. If low-cost housing is constructed in outlying areas and little or none of it is available for colored Americans, the present inequality of opportunity and the resulting resentments and frustrations will be accentuated.

The need is not for a pattern of integrated housing. It is for equal opportunity to secure decent housing. The difficulties in achieving this are considerable. Most of the available city land is already occupied and the cost of clearing slum property for new low-rent housing is practically prohibitive without Government assistance. The pressure for expansion of overcrowded Negro areas is so great that when an opening occurs, the pent-up Negro demand pours into the new neighborhood and the white residents usually flee in panic. The Negro's need for an alternative to blockbusting as a way of securing housing must be met just as the legitimate interests of white neighborhoods on the edge of Negro expansion areas must be protected. To achieve both these results and relieve the pressure of the present Negro concentration, new housing opportunities available to Negroes on all levels of income must be opened in the metropolitan area generally; slum clearance and the construction of new housing must take place in the central city.

The development of adequate and sound programs to achieve such equal opportunity to decent housing is urgent. The Commission found that a number of existing city, State, Federal, and private programs are contributing to this. It offers the following specific findings and recommendations as a further contribution to the necessary public understanding and action.

City and State laws, policies, and programs

Findings: In New York City, as in Pittsburgh and in four States—Colorado, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Oregon—there are far-reaching laws against discrimination in the sale or rentals of multiunit housing, and all publicly assisted housing. In New York State, as in 12 other States, there are laws against discrimination in publicly-assisted or urban renewal housing. Officials and community leaders in New York testified that these laws are having a valuable educational effect and that their enforcement, principally through mediation by the city commission on intergroup relations and the State commission against discrimination, is helping to promote equal opportunity in housing.

In Atlanta, the work of the mayor's west side mutual development committee, representing equally the Negro and white people in the area of the city undergoing the greatest racial transition, has served to replace blockbusting and reduce racial tension and violence by means of expanding Negro residential areas through negotiation and consent. This has enabled Negroes in Atlanta, unlike those in most American cities, to gain access to good outlying land and to build new suburban neighborhoods.

In Chicago, which has neither New York's laws against discrimination nor Atlanta's policy of negotiating agreements for Negro expansion, the Commission found that the Negroes' primary method of securing better housing was through the mutually unsatisfactory system of blockbusting, with the consequent uprooting of adjacent white neighborhoods and with inevitable racial tension and occasional violence.

On the basis of its hearings in these three cities the Commission finds that, whatever the particular approach adopted, some official city and State program and agency concerned with promoting equal opportunity to decent housing is needed. Such programs and agencies can bring about better public understanding of the problems and better communications between citizens. Whether or not cities or States are prepared to adopt antidiscrimination laws, and even in areas where racial separation is the prevailing public policy, it is possible that through interracial negotiation practical agreements for progress in housing can be reached. Where public opinion makes possible the adoption of laws against discrimination in housing, this might contribute significantly to the work of the agency promoting equal opportunity in housing. Then the agency would have legal support in its efforts at mediation and conciliation.

Recommendation No. 1: The Commission recommends that an appropriate biracial committee or commission on housing be established in all cities and States with substantial nonwhite populations. Such agencies should be empowered to study racial problems in housing, receive and investigate complaints alleging discrimination, attempt to solve problems through mediation and conciliation, and consider whether these agencies should be strengthened by the enactment of legislation for equal opportunity in areas of housing deemed advisable.[2]

Overall Federal laws, policies, and programs

Findings: The Federal Government now plays a major role in housing. Its participation in slum clearance, urban redevelopment, public housing and mortgage loan insurance amounts to billions of dollars. The Constitution prohibits any governmental discrimination by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin. The operation of Federal housing agencies and programs is subject to this principle. In addition there is in effect an act of Congress adopted in 1866 and re-enacted in 1870 that recognizes the equal right of all citizens, regardless of color, to purchase, rent, sell, or use real property.

While the fundamental legal principle is clear, Federal housing policies need to be better directed toward fulfilling the constitutional and congressional objective of equal opportunity. Mr. Norman Mason, the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, who is responsible for coordinating the various housing programs of the constituents of HHFA, testified before this Commission that he intends to develop policies that will further promote the principle of equal opportunity in all these housing programs. The Commission finds that there is much that the Administrator of the HHFA can do, through careful and determined administration, to assure that the principle of equal opportunity in Federal housing programs is applied not only in the top policies but at the operating levels in each constituent agency.

Because of the paramount national importance of this problem the Commission finds that direct action by the President in the form of an Executive order on equality of opportunity in housing is needed. The order should apply to all federally assisted housing, including housing constructed with the assistance of Federal mortgage insurance or loan guarantees as well as federally aided public housing and urban renewal projects.

There have been such Executive orders calling for the application of the principles of equal opportunity and equal treatment in the fields of Government contracts and Government employment, and in the armed services. Instead of establishing a new Presidential Committee, as was done in these other Executive orders, the President could request the Commission on Civil Rights, if its life is extended, to conduct the necessary continuing studies and investigations and make further recommendations.

Recommendation No. 2: Therefore, the Commission recommends that the President issue an Executive order stating the constitutional objective of equal opportunity in housing, directing all Federal agencies to shape their policies and practices to make the maximum contribution to the achievement of this goal, and requesting the Commission on Civil Rights, if extended, to continue to study and appraise the policies of Federal housing agencies, to prepare and propose plans to bring about the end of discrimination in all federally assisted housing and to make appropriate recommendations.

Recommendation No. 3: That the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency give high priority to the problem of gearing the policies and the operations of his constituent housing agencies to the attainment of equal opportunity in housing.

FHA and VA

Findings: The present policy of the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans' Administration is not to do further business with a builder who has been found in violation of a State or city law prohibiting discrimination. However, waiting upon the appropriate State or city agency to make a finding of violation of State or city law may result in Federal assistance to a builder who is openly or manifestly evading such law. By the time any State or city action against such a builder has been completed the projects may well have been built and sold or rented on a discriminatory basis.

Recommendation No. 4: Therefore, the Commission recommends that, in support of State and city laws the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans' Administration should strengthen their present agreements with States and cities having laws against discrimination in housing by requiring that builders subject to these laws who desire the benefits of Federal mortgage insurance and loan guaranty programs agree in writing that they will abide by such laws. FHA and VA should establish their own fact-finding machinery to determine whether such builders are violating State and city laws, and, if it is found that they are, immediate steps should be taken to withdraw Federal benefits from them, pending final action by the appropriate State agency or court.

Public housing

Findings: The location of sites for public housing projects and the kind of housing provided play an important part in determining whether public housing becomes almost entirely nonwhite housing, whether it accentuates or decreases the present patterns of racial concentrations, and whether it contributes to a rise in housing standards generally. A policy of "scatteration" of smaller projects throughout the whole metropolitan area may remedy some of the present defects of public housing.

Public housing projects can serve as schools for better housing and home keeping. A large number of the tenants are recent migrants from rural areas, unprepared for urban life. Placing them in decent housing units and requiring that decent standards be maintained will help them make a successful adjustment to city life. Locating these projects in better neighborhoods and making them less institutional in appearance will add to this educational process.

As a result of the large number of nonwhites in need of low-cost housing and the tendency of whites to avoid living in the midst of a nonwhite majority, many projects are all or predominantly nonwhite. This may result in a proportion of nonwhite occupancy higher than that actually required under the Public Housing Administration's "racial equity" formula based on the estimated needs of the two racial groups. In one city the Commission found that the location of public housing sites within areas of Negro concentration resulted in de facto discrimination against low-income white citizens.

Recommendation No. 5: Therefore, the Commission recommends that the Public Housing Administration take affirmative action to encourage the selection of sites on open land in good areas outside the present centers of racial concentration. PHA should put the local housing authorities on notice that their proposals will be evaluated in this light. PHA should further encourage the construction of smaller projects that fit better into residential neighborhoods, rather than large development of tall "high rise" apartments that set a special group apart in a community of its own.

Urban Renewal

Findings: City and private programs of slum clearance, conservation, and redevelopment, assisted by Federal aid from the Urban Renewal Administration, are changing the face of the nation. Since nonwhite residents comprise a large proportion of the persons displaced by these programs and since nonwhites do not have equal opportunity to housing, it is important that special needs and problems of the nonwhite minority receive adequate and fair consideration in all such programs.

Recommendation No. 6: Therefore, the Commission recommends that the Urban Renewal Administration take positive steps to assure that in the preparation of overall community "workable programs" for urban renewal, spokesmen for minority groups are in fact included among the required citizens participation.

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT ON HOUSING

(By Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton:)

We yield to no one in our good will and anxiety for equal justice to all races, in the field of housing as elsewhere. A good home should be the goal of everyone regardless of color, and the Government should aid in providing housing in keeping with the means and ambitions of the people. Government aid is important where public improvements have displaced people and where slums become a liability to the community. This does not mean, however, that the Government owes everyone a house regardless of his ambition, industry, or will to provide for himself. When generosity takes away self-reliance or the determination of one to improve his own lot, it ceases to be a blessing. We should help, but not pamper. But there remains, and is, a financial limit beyond which the Government cannot go.

In dealing with the problem of housing, we must face realities and recognize the fact that no one pattern will serve the country as a whole. Some parts of the foregoing report are argumentative, with suggestions keyed to integration rather than housing, and if carried out in full will result in delay and in many cases defeat of adequate housing, which is our prime objective. The repeated expressions, "freedom of choice," "open housing," "open market," and "scatteration" suggest a fixed program of mixing the races anywhere and everywhere regardless of the wishes of either race and particular problems involved. The result would be dissension, strife, and even violence evident in sections where you would least expect it.

To use it is not only wise but imperative that biracial committees be set up in different sections to provide areas for adequate housing in keeping with just requirements for the people involved. This can be done; it is being done in different sections such as Atlanta, Ga., in keeping with the wishes of both races. This responsibility, however, must be met in a positive, courageous, and constructive manner in keeping with the requirement at the local level.

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT ON HOUSING

(By Commissioners Hesburgh and Johnson:)

While the Commission has not had time to consider many important aspects of the complicated housing problem in view of its primary attention to investigation of alleged denials of the right to vote and to studies in the education field, three points that were much under discussion in the Commission's housing hearings in our opinion deserve special attention.

(1) Relocation of persons displaced by federally aided projects: The Commission has found that nonwhite Americans constitute a high proportion of those displaced by urban renewal programs (and, it should be added, by federally aided highway programs), and that such nonwhites are severely restricted in their housing opportunities. We believe that, in addition to the recommendation of the Commission that in the preparation of local workable programs for urban renewal there be adequate nonwhite participation, other measures should be taken to assure that the human side of slum clearance and redevelopment is given adequate attention.

For instance, the Federal-aid highway program, which is displacing an increasing number of urban residents and is often being used to clear slums, has no provision requiring that displaced families be rehoused in accordance with specific standards, nor is any financial assistance provided for their relocation. While property owners receive compensation for property condemned, the problem of relocation arises largely in urban areas where those displaced, many of them tenants who receive no compensation have great difficulty finding, or cannot find, decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within their means.

In the urban renewal program, on the other hand the act of Congress requires that "decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings" be available at rents and prices within the financial means of the displaced families, either in the urban renewal area itself, or in areas "not generally less desirable." However, the Commission received evidence that such housing for relocation is in some places not in fact available.

President Eisenhower has said that steps must be taken "to insure that families of minority groups displaced by urban redevelopment operations have an opportunity to acquire adequate housing." It seems to us essential that all the Federal agencies take such positive steps to assure that these minimum human requirements of slum clearance and redevelopment are in fact met by local communities.

While the Federal-aid highway program should not be turned into a housing program, the act should be amended to provide that in any urban area where any substantial number of low-income persons are to be displaced by the construction of a Federal-aided highway, the locality must incorporate the highway program in its urban renewal program, and the relocation requirements and standards of the Urban Renewal Administration must be met in regard to all such displaced persons, or the localities must otherwise see that decent, safe, and sanitary housing is available to such persons.

(2) Racial patterns in urban renewal: As President Eisenhower has also said, the Federal Government must "prevent the dislocation of such [minority group] families through the misuse of slum clearance programs." In the Commission's housing hearings there were allegations that urban renewal programs are being used in some instances for "Negro clearance" and that either new patterns of segregated neighborhoods are being created or existing patterns of segregation are being substantially accentuated. With the nonwhite citizens' participation in planning urban renewal at the local level which the Commission has recommended such questions should be raised at an early stage. In addition, we recommend that communities' "workable programs" and specific urban renewal projects be examined by the Urban Renewal Administration and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to assure that no community is using Federal urban renewal assistance to accomplish such results. Examination of each urban renewal project in this light will require the services of persons of special competence in the field of intergroup relations.

(3) The shortage of low-cost housing: The studies and hearings of the Commission have shown that progress in remedying the lack of opportunity to decent housing by nonwhite Americans depends in large part upon progress in overcoming the general housing shortage for lower income Americans. This is also directly connected with relocation and urban renewal. Slum clearance and urban redevelopment are necessary but they require the provision of decent low cost housing for those displaced. President Eisenhower has said that the Government will "encourage adequate market financing and the construction of new housing for such families on good, well located sites."

In the absence of better answers, it seems imperative that the present programs of urban renewal, public housing, home mortgage insurance, and assistance, including the voluntary home mortgage credit program, be continued on a sufficiently long term basis to make sound planning by local housing authorities possible. Beyond this, most officials, housing experts, and industry leaders testified that further efforts must still be undertaken to encourage the construction and sale of decent low-cost private housing.

The Commission did not try to make specific recommendations in these areas that require expert knowledge, but we would like to stress the importance of this being done and of sound measures being put into effect by those who are so competent.

In view of the testimony in Atlanta and Chicago that the ceiling on section 221 (low cost relocation housing) mortgage insurance is too low for new housing in urban areas and in view of the recent action of Congress in approving an increase in the permissible amounts of FHA mortgage insurance, including an increase in the ceiling on section 221, consideration should be given to raising the section 221 limitations to levels consistent with the cost of new housing in urban areas. Consideration should also be given to proposals made by leaders of the housing industry in the Commission's hearings for the reduction of the cost of financing housing for lower income residents, including proposals for special mortgage assistance through the Federal National Mortgage Association and for direct loans such as those provided at 3⅛ percent interest for 40 years in the college housing program of the Community Facilities Administration.

Without trying to appraise particular proposals, it can be said that programs to overcome the housing shortage for lower income Americans are not luxuries but are essential needs of the Nation.

PART SIX: GENERAL STATEMENTS BY COMMISSIONERS

Statement by Commissioner Theodore M. Hesburgh

I should like to explain my personal position on the basic issues of this report and, especially, on those recommendations which were not unanimous. May I say, at once, how deeply I respect the persons, the convictions, and the judgments of all my distinguished fellow Commissioners, and may I frankly disavow, for myself, any personal claim to ultimate wisdom in these difficult questions of prudential judgment. One can only, in good conscience, do his honest best.

In appraising admittedly thorny situations in the various areas of civil rights examined by the Commission, one must be guided by his own general philosophical and theological convictions. I believe that civil rights were not created, but only recognized and formulated, by our Federal and State constitutions and charters. Civil rights are important corollaries of the great proposition, at the heart of Western civilization, that every human person is a res sacra, a sacred reality, and as such is entitled to the opportunity of fulfilling those great human potentials with which God has endowed every man. Without this spiritual and moral concept of the nature and destiny of man, our political philosophy is meaningless, bankrupt, and defenseless in the face of the opposite philosophy of man that stalks the world today.

I begin, then, with the proposition so well enunciated in our Declaration of Independence, that all men are indeed created equal. Equality, however, is not the same as egalitarianism, for all men are not created with equal intelligence, equal ambition, equal talent. But all men are entitled to an equal opportunity to exercise and develop whatever intelligence, ambition, and talent they possess. Ultimately, the full flowering of the democratic process depends upon the full development of all the various human talents existing in the Nation.

As I read American history, the unfolding story of our Nation centers about the often agonizing attempts to achieve the fullness of human dignity through the ever-widening application of that equal opportunity which has best characterized America in the family of nations. Deep and often dark emotions have been aroused by the discussion of integration and segregation, but anyone who really understands the majesty of the "American dream" cannot fail to see in our history that equality of opportunity for all men has been our most valid response to the inherent and God-given dignity of every human person.

I firmly believe that if all Americans are given the equal opportunity to be educated to the full extent of their human talents, equal opportunities to work to the fullness of their potential contribution to our society, equal opportunity at least to live in decent housing and in wholesome neighborhoods consonant with their basic human dignity, and, moreover, equal access to housing and neighborhoods as befits their means and social development, and, finally, equal opportunity to participate in the body politic through the free and universal exercise of the franchise, then the problem of civil rights for all Americans will eventually solve itself, to the end that America, and the human dignity of all Americans, will be the richer for this solution.

The growth of equal opportunity on this fourfold front of voting, education, work, and housing is the full and unavoidable price of completely eliminating second-class citizenship across the face of America. The civil rights problem differs, of course, from place to place, but it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find any section of America where all of these equal opportunities flourish in their fullness. And there are localities in America today where not one of these four opportunities exists for nonwhite Americans.

Several myths impede a reasonable approach to a solution. Perhaps the most basic is the myth of white superiority: That any white man is, simply by reason of his being white, superior to any nonwhite man. Apart from the philosophical, theological, and scientific absurdity of this myth, it is best disproved in practice. Deprive any white man, however talented and ambitious, of the equal opportunity to become educated; to work as befits his education, ambition, and talent; to live in a decent house and neighborhood; deprive him of the opportunity of participating in the political process; continue this total deprivation for his children and his children's children, and then see how superior he, his children, and his grandchildren are. On the other hand, open up such equal opportunities to nonwhites and their children, and see how many of them will begin to excel. This is not a distant speculation. It is already happening here and abroad.

A lesser corollary of this myth of white superiority is to say that the nonwhites are not ready for equal opportunity. Yet, if nonwhites are to be eternally denied the opportunity, they will never be ready, and the problem becomes eternally insoluble. There must be a beginning to every solution.

No full-fledged solution is possible unless the fourfold equal opportunity mentioned above is considered to be indivisible. If the nonwhite American is granted one equal opportunity, say, education, and then denied the choice of a job and a house commensurate with his education and achievement, the inner core of his motivation for self-improvement is destroyed. If he achieves education, professional status, and the vote—three equal opportunities possible in some sections of America—and still is constrained from living where his heart desires and his means and achievement permit, then the stigma of second-class citizenship is still visited upon him and his family. I see no answer to this total problem unless human judgments and evaluations be made by reason of the quality, not the pigmentation, of the human person.

No one is so naive as to imagine the complete and overnight realization of equal opportunity on this fourfold front for all Americans. But, on the other hand, no one who really believes in full-fledged citizenship for all Americans should delude himself today regarding the true personal price involved in achieving it. The price will be nothing short of heroism in certain areas. Because of the deep emotional overtones of this problem, and its existence in every phase of American life, no American can escape taking a stand on civil rights. No American can really disengage himself from this problem. Each of us must choose to deepen the anguish of the problem, by silence and passivity, if nothing more, or must take a forthright stand on principles that give some hope of eventual solution.

There have been and will be reasonable differences of opinion regarding the nature and timing of practical solutions. But prudence, patience, good will, honesty, and compassion must be among the ingredients of all hopeful solutions. I pray that our differences of opinion may not divide us; that the basic principles of human dignity may be asserted by all; and that respect for the sacred reality of every human person may be central to all solutions.

Now for the specifics. The Commission's voting recommendation No. 5, for the appointment of temporary Federal registrars in cases of voting discrimination, is an attempt to assure qualified voters of equal opportunity to vote in the next Federal election, an opportunity now denied many. I have gone beyond this, together with Chairman Hannah and Commissioner Johnson, to propose an amendment to the Constitution that as a long-range solution would, clearly and simply, assure all Americans the equal opportunity of free and universal suffrage in all elections. The American dream would thus at last become a political reality, and America could then validly proclaim to all the world that we have full faith in the democratic process, without equivocation, chicanery, or subterfuge. To me, this is the final answer to the problems we have studied in the field of voting.

In education, again I have associated myself with Chairman Hannah and Commissioner Johnson in calling for consistency in the three powers of the Federal Government. The judiciary has outlawed compulsory segregation, and yet legislative programs and executive agencies continue to grant millions to institutions of higher learning which in practice disregard the supreme law of the land. Solutions are admittedly more difficult and complicated in the area of elementary and secondary education. But higher education is a mature and sophisticated domain, the birthplace of our future leaders, the alma mater that is ready, I believe, as the Armed Forces were, to grant immediate full opportunity to all Americans who qualify to enter this domain. I favor equal opportunity to obtain Federal educational subsidies that strengthen all our institutions of higher education in this country, both public and private. But the reception of these public funds should be conditioned by the equal opportunity of all the public to enjoy the educational benefits they provide, insofar as any American is qualified educationally, not racially, to enjoy them. Any other arrangement allows the various branches of Government to work at cross-purposes, and places an undue burden on the judiciary alone. Moreover, I am personally convinced that the intelligent and mature leaders of higher education, administrations and faculties alike, are ready for this forthright admission of equal opportunity in this most sensitive segment of our Nation—our colleges and universities, both public and private.

Finally, in the field of housing, perhaps the most difficult of all areas, I have associated myself with Commissioner Johnson in several conclusions beyond those unanimously adopted by the Commission. Again, the use of public money for the benefit of all, equal opportunity, is the cardinal principle. How to do this practically, in a world of admitted prejudice, is the nub of the problem. It does not appear revolutionary to insist that, when the most needy members of our society—those with the presently poorest housing and the lowest income—are displaced by Federally-assisted slum clearance, urban redevelopment, or new highway programs, they be given opportunity to find decent, safe, and sanitary housing elsewhere, within their means, and not be dumped into already overcrowded racial ghettos. It does not seem inconsistent with the testimony we have heard to suggest that local and State laws might lead the way in those communities that pride themselves on equal opportunity. However, it would seem inconsistent with equal opportunity if Federal funds are used in a discriminatory manner, either to confine nonwhite Americans to a certain area of the city, generally less desirable, or to circumscribe Federal assistance in new private housing almost entirely at the whim of builders for white Americans. Also, it seems unfair that federally assisted hospitals and airports have different facilities for different classes of American citizens.

While Federal laws and policies may and should illuminate the ideal of equal civil rights for all Americans, it is fairly obvious, from the varying and nationwide dimensions of the problem, that only State and local leadership, wise and courageous, patient, compassionate, and understanding, will eventually bring the ideal to greater reality throughout our Nation. It is in this sense that legislation alone will not solve the problem, and that ultimate solutions must come, as the President has said, from individual minds and hearts. But law, defining the goals and standards of the community, is itself one of the great changers of minds and hearts. In this democracy, law points the way toward ultimate freedom and justice, for all Americans, everywhere in our land. Equality under the law has long been a cherished American ideal. May it ever become, more and more, a proud American reality.

Statement by Commissioner George M. Johnson

While my service as a member of the Commission has been relatively short, I have been involved in its studies from the beginning as director of the Office of Laws, Plans, and Research. Some of the points I make in this supplementary statement arise from my desire to make the Commission's recommendations more fully responsive to the findings of those studies. It is our duty to recommend measures that are equal to the problems disclosed by our factfinding. I would like to have had more time to discuss some of these points further with my fellow Commission members. However we may disagree on certain matters of timing and principle, I respect each one's judgment.

The problems which Congress assigned to this Commission for investigation, study, and appraisal relate generally to the American constitutional promise of equal justice under law for all citizens. Implicit in this promise is the democratic goal of equal opportunity for all citizens. Under our Constitution the power and responsibility to implement and fulfill the constitutional promise and the goal are shared by the Federal Government; State and local governments, and the people. This Commission was asked by the Congress to study and appraise the Federal Government's role in exercising its power and discharging its responsibilities in this regard.

A crucial element in such a study and appraisal is the extent to which the Federal Government may be found to be participating, directly or indirectly, in activities contrary to the goal of equal opportunity. The elimination of all Federal policies and practices falling in this category is, in my view, a matter of prime importance and requires immediate remedial action by the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government.

Prompt and effective measures to eliminate such practices should be undertaken, even though some citizens may be inconvenienced temporarily. For this reason I have recommended the withholding of Federal funds in aid of education at the primary and secondary levels, as well as those in aid of higher education, wherever the policies and practices of the institutions involved are not in accord with the constitutional principle of equal protection of the laws. Since 1954, compulsory racial segregation in public schools has been unconstitutional. It is time to require as a condition of further Federal assistance to any such school or school district that there be some indication of good-faith compliance with the constitutional requirement of desegregation with all deliberate speed.

The achievement of equal justice under the law and equality of opportunity should not be left to the Federal judiciary. The legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government also have basic responsibilities to secure and protect the constitutional rights of all citizens. The public interest is not best served if private citizens and organizations are left to vindicate constitutional rights of national significance through litigation in the Federal courts. The development of public law should not be left primarily to private litigation.

The void created by inaction on the part of the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government must be filled with positive and constructive measures designed to remove from all Federal policies and practices any semblance of inconsistency with the mandate of the Constitution. Where necessary, laws should be enacted to accomplish this result.

Experience has demonstrated that laws are necessary to implement fundamental constitutional principles and that they are effective in areas of intergroup conflict. Laws restrain those few who will not respect the rights of others. They also have an educative value for the community as a whole. In this way laws help to change the hearts and minds of men by changing some of their practices and by keeping them ever mindful of the goals toward which a free people dedicated to equal justice under law and equal opportunity for all citizens must strive.

Accordingly, in my view, there is great merit in the often proposed legislation to broaden the powers of the Attorney General to seek injunctive relief in civil rights matters. Such legislation would provide the executive branch of the Federal Government with additional power to correct flagrant abuses of the rights of some American citizens. Unfortunately, the shortness of time and the pressure of its activities precluded the Commission from exploring the need for such legislation. However, my appraisal of the areas of study selected by the Commission, and particularly of the problem of effecting school desegregation, has convinced me of the necessity for and the efficacy of such legislation.

While I believe that laws consistently and effectively enforced are necessary to secure and protect the civil rights of some American citizens, they constitute only a portion of what is required if equal justice and equal opportunity are to be attained throughout this Nation. There is as great a need for leadership.

Neither in their enactment nor in their enforcement will laws of themselves provide real and lasting solutions of the most controversial problems of civil rights facing this Nation. The need is for enlightened and constructive leadership capable of devising practical programs consonant with constitutional principles and of rallying the American people to the cause of justice for all citizens.

The Federal Government should take the lead in this task. It should seek to bring together leaders of both races who in good faith could explore ways and means to reduce tensions, create better understanding, increase respect for law and order, and organize the resources of the Nation in a concerted effort to eradicate within the foreseeable future inequalities based on race, color, religion, or national origin. I believe that within our Nation such leadership exists and that when marshaled and fully utilized it will be capable of meeting the present crisis in civil rights.

Finally, I would say that while no one man or group of men has the solutions of these complex problems, by approaching them with moral conviction and resolute courage we can take the necessary and proper steps toward full realization of the goal of equal justice under law and equal opportunity for all American citizens.

Statement by Commissioner John S. Battle

I have stated my objections to certain specific recommendations contained in the report.

In addition thereto, and without in any way impugning the motives of any member of the Commission, for each of whom I have the highest regard, I must strongly disagree with the nature and tenor of the report. In my judgment it is not an impartial factual statement, such as I believe to have been the intent of Congress, but rather, in large part, an argument in advocacy of preconceived ideas in the field of race relations.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR EASTLAND

Late last week the Commission on Civil Rights issued a 38-page printed document entitled "Excerpts From Report of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1959."

I opposed the creation of the Civil Rights Commission in 1957 for a number of reasons, which I stated during the debate on the floor in 1957. My opposition to the Commission then is now justified after examining the excerpts from the Commission's report. It will be recalled that those who were arguing the creation of this Commission stated over and over again that this body was to be purely a factfinding commission and that its primary responsibility would be to gather facts. The then Attorney General, Mr. Brownell, emphasized that the purpose of the Commission is to provide "a full scale public study to bring out the facts and to unite responsible people of good will in a common effort to solve these problems."

I ask any fair-minded person, after reviewing the outline of the Commission's report as it has been sent up to us, if it is, first, a factfinding report, and second, if it is such a study which would unite responsible people of good will in a common effort to solve these problems. Quite to the contrary, in my judgment, it will not.

As I read it, this report will do more to create dissension among the races than any document I have ever seen produced by an instrumentality of our Government. A respected member of the Commission, the Honorable John S. Battle, stated:

"I must strongly disagree with the nature and tenor of the report. In my judgment, it is not an impartial factual statement such as I believe to have been the intent of Congress but rather, in large part, an argument in advocacy of preconceived ideas in the field of race relations."

I agree wholeheartedly with Commissioner Battle. This is not an impartial, factual statement as was to be expected when Congress created this Commission. The ideas expressed and many of the recommendations proposed by this Commission flaunt the Constitution and the long established decisions of our Supreme Court.

These excerpts present first, what are called Commission recommendations, and second, proposals (by one to three Commissioners).

These so-called Commission recommendations and proposals are the most radical, extreme, unreasonable, far-reaching and nation-destroying propositions I have ever read. They cause me great concern for the safety, the welfare, and the future of our States and Federal Government. I am concerned not only about the contents of these recommendations, but I am equally concerned because of such ideas being advanced by a governmental commission.

In my judgment, these excerpts demonstrate that certain members of the Commission have exceeded the powers and duties conferred upon them and the clear intent of Congress, as contained in the 1957 Act creating the Commissison. I am sustained in this assertion by certain members of the Commission.

All of the recommendations are either unnecessary, unwise or unconstitutional and contrary to the basic theories of the organization and operation of our State and National Governments. All proposals call for a destruction of and complete change in the basis principles of our Republican form of Government under which the States and this Nation have operated since 1788.

Many of the recommendations and proposals, in my opinion, could only have been equalled by mutterings from The Kremlin. I feel that when Khrushchev arrives in this country next week and hears about these recommendations, he will feel completely at home, and probably will find himself in substantial agreement with the ideas advanced in this report.

If certain of the so-called recommendations and proposals are carried out in form or spirit, then this indestructible union of States will be in jeopardy.

The Commission is composed of six members: John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University; Robert G. Storey, Dallas, Tex., dean, Southern Methodist Law School; John S. Battle, former Governor of Virginia; Doyle E. Carlton, former Governor of Florida; Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president, Notre Dame University; and George Johnson, former employee of the Commission.

No proposal is approved by a majority of the Commission. There are three proposals. Two of them, one for a constitutional amendment to establish universal suffrage, are proposed by Commissioners Hannah, Hesburgh, and Johnson. It is violently opposed by Commissioners Battle, Storey, and Carlton. The second proposes to withhold funds from any public or privately owned and operated college or university which does not mix the races. This was first proposed, I believe, by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, of New York. It is here opposed by Commissioners Battle, Carlton, and Storey. In opposing this idea they stated that their "staff studies were directed toward * * * public and secondary schools, not private schools upon any level, and not institutions of higher education, whether public or private."

Commissioner Johnson proposes to withhold such Federal funds from any public elementary and secondary State-operated school which does not mix the races, but he is not joined in this by any of the other five Commissioners.

No single recommendation has the approval of all Commissioners. Commissioner

Battle dissents pointedly from many of them and generally the entire report. Commissioners Storey, Carlton, and Battle express views contrary to the recommendations dealing with education.

Commissioners Storey, Battle, and Carlton dissent from the premise and the conclusions in the housing recommendation. They interpret the recommendations on housing to say that the "Government owes everyone a house regardless of his ambition, industry, or will to provide for himself," and they, Commissioners Storey, Battle, and Carlton, deny this.

Six of the basic principles upon which this Nation was founded and has operated since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1788, are:

(1) A union of several sovereign political entities, States, for common purposes;

(2) Division of legislative, executive, and judicial powers between the Federal Government and the States; the Federal Government is solely one of delegated and enumerated powers; the States and their people are the holders of all power not delegated to the Federal Government;

(3) The State and Federal Governments operate within their spheres as set out in the Constitution upon all persons and property within the territorial limits of the Nation;

(4) The States and Federal Government each have their own spheres of law enforcement and executive and judicial power;

(5) The Federal Government is supreme over the States only in the spheres and as to matters delegated to it by the States and the people of the States;

(6) Citizenship in and of the United States; citizenship in and of each State.

Many of the so-called recommendations and proposals of the Civil Rights Commission, if accepted and enacted into law, would create an astounding similarity to certain sections of the Constitutions of the Soviet Union and its satellite Latvia, and also Yugoslavia, which is a Communist state.

From page 793 and 794 of the 1959 printed hearings of the Civil Rights before the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary, we find the provisions of the Russian, Latvian, and Yugoslavia Constitution quoted and which are:

RUSSIAN CONSTITUTION

"Article 123 of the U.S.S.R. Constitution provides that:

"Equality of rights of citizens of the U.S.S.R., irrespective of their nationality or race, in all spheres of economic, government, cultural, political, and other public activity is an indefeasible law."

LATVIAN CONSTITUTION

"Article 95: The equality of rights of the citizens of the Latvian S.S.R., regardless of their nationality and race, in all branches of economic, state, cultural and social-political life is an unalterable law."

YUGOSLAVIA CONSTITUTION

"Article I: Any limitation of rights, or the granting of any concessions or privileges to citizens of the F.P.R.Y. on the grounds of difference of nationality, race or religion, which contravene the constitutional principles of equal rights for all citizens and people and fraternity and unity of the peoples of the F.P.R.Y., shall be punished under this law."

I suggest you keep the above provisions in mind as you read and study these excerpts. You be the judge of whether there is any similarity.

The entire tenor of the proposals which represent the thinking of Commissioners Johnson, Hesburgh, and Hannah, and some of the recommendations, do, in my opinion, bear down to this objective: To bring about mixing and amalgamation of the races in this nation in every aspect of its life. The vehicles of education and housing are chosen on which to bring this about, together with certain phases of the voting recommendations. Many of the recommendations and the proposals which are opposed by Commissioners Battle, Carlton, and Storey seek to make the members of the colored race a specially privileged group, giving to them privileges not permitted to the members of the white or any other race.

Incidentally, in connection with housing, a most remarkable theory is advanced by Commissioners Hannah, Johnson and Hesburgh, and I refer you to page 171 of the Excerpts. The theory there announced is that no "nonwhite American families" should be required to live in "secondhand houses"; that the Government owes a house to everybody, and particularly members of the nonwhite race. They say, substantially, if you give a man a new house to live in, you make him a different man.

The proposed constitutional amendment is thus:

"ARTICLE XXIII

"Section 1

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State or by any person for any cause except inability to meet State age or length-of-residence requirements uniformly applied to all persons within the State, or legal confinement at the time of registration or election. This right to vote shall include the right to register or otherwise qualify to vote, and to have one's vote counted."

This amendment is, in language and intent, contrary to the basic purpose and intent of the Constitution of the United States under which the Federal Government leaves to the States the determination of who shall be qualified electors for the most numerous branch of their State legislature and then selects these persons as those who are qualified to vote for Senators and Representatives in Congress. See article I, section 11, clause 1, and section III, clause 1, as amended by the 17th amendment.

Under this proposed Amendment all idiots, insant persons, paupers and criminals, who are not in "legal confinement" may vote provided they are citizens of the United States and meet the State-set requirements of residence and age. Thus we will have a Government selected in part by idiots, insane persons, paupers, illiterates, and criminals, who are not in "legal confinement."

This proposed amendment also goes to the extent of wiping out all State laws which impose any requirements to become a qualified elector except age, and length of residence, and citizenship of the United States.

Such a proposal in my opinion should shock the conscience of any American.

This proposed amendment would nullify the laws of 39 States which prohibit idiots and insane persons from registering or voting. It would nullify the law of 43 States which prohibit persons who have been convicted of a felony or infamous crime from voting. It would nullify the laws of 8 States which prohibit paupers from voting. It would nullify the laws of 22 States which have other provisions disqualifying persons from voting on other grounds. It would nullify the laws of 19 States which require a literacy test of electors.

The Federal Government would be controlling the qualifications of State offices and State electors for those State offices.

If such a preposterous idea had ever been advanced during the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the Members would have recoiled in horror, and the Constitution of the United States would never have been brought into being.

This proposal is so ridiculous as to be insulting to the intelligence of Congress and the citizens of this Nation.

Commissioners Battle, Carlton, and Storey strongly condemn this proposal. Pages 95 and 96 of the excepts.

Further, as to voting after laying a fallacious and unsound premise, pages 91–93 of the excepts, five of the Commissioners, with former Governor Battle, strongly dissenting, proposed substantially the following:

A startling, invalid and ridiculous proposal dealing with registration and voting for presidential electors and Senators and Representatives whereby among other things all control over the qualifications, registration, and voting for those offices be withdrawn completely from not only the States, but the courts, Federal and State, under startling circumstances, and in the place of the courts substitute the Civil Rights Commission.

In substance, this so-called recommendation No. 5, provides:

"Whenever nine persons 'in a district, county, parish, or other recognized political subdivision of a State, swear that they believe themselves qualified under State law to be electors, but have been denied the right to register because of race, color, religion or national origin, and place such affidavits in the hands of the President of the United States, they can then destroy the control of the States and the courts over registration and voting for these offices. They can make the President of the United States act. Upon such affidavits being received by the President, he shall refer them to the Civil Rights Commission; and upon receiving them, the Commission shall investigate the allegations, and if they find that any of the affidavits are "well-founded affidavits," they shall certify them to the President and to such temporary registrar as he may designate.

Upon receipt of such certification the President shall appoint any Federal officer or employee in the area from which such complaints are received, as a temporary registrar. This registrar then shall take over and administer the State qualification laws—determine who are qualified electors and who are not under the State laws; the persons the registrars find qualified will then be given a certificate entitling them to register and vote for the offices of presidential electors or Senators or Representatives; such registrar shall certify to the State registration officials the names of the persons he finds so qualified; the State authorities would be absolutely bound to let those persons vote in any, or all, elections, for said offices; and the registrar shall continue in office until the President decides that it is no longer necesary to keep him.

This is equally as preposterous, and in some respects, even worse than, the proposed constitutional amendment. Under this recommendation, all that is required to completely divest the State authorities of any control over the qualifications of electors is for nine people to believe that they are qualified under State law to be electors and to believe that they have been denied the right to register because of race, color, religion, or national origin. That is the sole, and only criteria. If the Commission finds that they believe as aforesaid, then comes the Federal registrar. The issue is not, and could not be, under the proposal, whether they are in fact qualified or whether they have been in fact and in law, qualified, or whether they have been in fact and in law, denied the right to register for said reasons.

The courts are powerless to act. Full authority is vested in the Civil Rights Commission. The President of the United States does not have any discretion. He is made merely the errand boy of these nine persons and the Civil Rights Commission.

It is clear to me and should be to everyone that even the sponsors of this recommendation realize and know that now under the Constitution of the United States this proposal is grossly void and unconstitutional.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. For what purpose does the Senator from New York desire the floor?

Mr. JAVITS. So that I may speak for 1 minute.

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from New York for 1 minute.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I regret very much that there should be such vehemence about the matter of desegregation in the public schools, which we are discussing, but it does not faze me a bit. If it did, I think it would be a triumph for the very negation of the Constitution of the United States against which I protest.

So long as the State of New York pays 20 percent of the taxes of the United States, which include millions upon millions of dollars which go to every one of the Southern States which in terms of the Supreme Court's decision in the Brown case are flouting the Constitution every day, and so long as New York's millions have shed their blood in the defense of this whole country——

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I invoke rule XIX. The Senator from New York stated that the Southern States are flouting the Constitution. I deny that South Carolina is flouting the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule, the Senator from New York will take his seat.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senator from New York be permitted to proceed in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall be through in just a minute. So long as the people of New York, more than 16 million strong, have shed their blood in the defense of the United States of America, and so long as the people in a great Civil War saw fit to affirm the very values which are put in issue here; to wit, that we are a Nation, not a collection of miscellaneous States—just so long, I shall carry on. I am certain that many others in this body, with dignity and with complete respect for the sincerity of those who argue the other way—will strive with me in the humble effort to provide legislation which can be lived with by men and women who have had social customs with which many of us disagree—and I think the great majority of the people of the country disagree, and have disagreed for many, many years. So long as it is necessary to give them every opportunity to accommodate themselves to what is required by our Constitution and the modern world.

It is not a very pleasant occupation, and I promise I will not get so vehement about it as perhaps some other persons. But, Mr. President, I feel, in deep conscience, and in pursuance of my oath as a Senator of the United States, that I shall carry on.

I am grateful to the Senator from Oregon for yielding.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for 1 minute?

Mr. MORSE. I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, Mississippi, South Carolina, and other Southern States do not flout the Constitution. We have harmony. We have racial amity. We will not permit any State or any section where rape, murder, theft, and other crimes are widespread in the educational system, according to the press, as they are in some States, to dictate the educational system of our section of the country.

God knows, we are free men, and we are going to stay free. We will not be dictated to by New York or any other group.

I have evidence, from Government public housing reports, of the horrible conditions which exist in New York's interracial housing. I shall make those reports available to the Senate in the very near future.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR MARGARET CHASE SMITH OF MAINE

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield me not to exceed 1 minute, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor?

Mr. MORSE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a few minutes ago, by a yea-and-nay vote, the Senate acted on the bill to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. This was the 700th consecutive rollcall which the distinguished senior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] has answered.

I pay tribute to Senator SMITH. Her accomplishment is a mark of the zeal which ever motivates her public labors and the indefatigable devotion to the public trust which is present in her every act.

I rather imagine that to have stood up and be counted 700 consecutive times is a unique record. The people of Maine may be proud of the record of their senior Senator. The Senate is.

On this occasion, on behalf of all my colleagues, I am most happy to pay my respects to a very gallant and a most gracious Senator, as we observe this additional evidence of her high devotion to the public trust.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the statement by the distinguished Senator from California simply illustrates again my wonderment about the phenomenon called coincidence, because his remarks about the distinguished senior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] are in line with something I was about to say before he asked me to yield, and without my even knowing the purpose of his request.

When I put this rose in my lapel this afternoon, it was, of course, symbolic of my intention to speak at some length tonight in case it became necessary to do so. But, Mr. President, it is obvious now that it will not be necessary for me to speak at any great length. Therefore, I shall conserve my energies for another day.

I have taken the rose from my lapel. I would not want to leave it there because to do so would be notice to the Senate, so long as it stayed there, that I intended to speak at length.

I, too, would like to join in paying tribute to Senator SMITH, because each day she graces the rose by wearing one. That is a great honor to the rose; and, of course, the rose does great honor to her graciousness and beauty, and to the affection in which she is held in the Senate. But I hope she will not be embarrassed or will not take offense if I ask a member of the Senate staff to see to it that the rose is delivered to her, or if I ask that a page boy deliver it to her. She will be found in the family gallery of the Senate at this time. I send this beautiful rose to her with my compliments for the great record she has made in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8609) to amend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, as amended, by extending the authorities of titles I and II, strengthening the program of disposals through barter, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. GRANT, Mr. GATHINGS, Mr. ALBERT, Mr. THOMPSON of Texas, Mr. HOEVEN, Mr. BELCHER, and Mr. MCINTIRE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

KLAMATH COUNTY PUBLIC WELFARE COMMISSION'S VIEWS ON THE FOOD STAMP PLAN

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, there came to my attention shortly after the conlusion of the debate on the Public Law 480 amendments an excellent letter addressed to me by the Klamath County Public Welfare Commission. This letter expresses strong support of the food stamp plan. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KLAMATH COUNTY PUBLIC WELFARE COMMISSION,
Klamath Falls, Oreg., August 25, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Local publications reveal that the House of Representatives has passed a bill making surplus commodities available to recipients of public assistance and low income families on a food stamp plan. We would like to ask you, as a Member of the Senate, to give this bill your most careful consideration when it comes before you.

The Klamath County Public Welfare Commission has been vitally interested in the distribution of surplus commodities to recipients of public assistance and low income families as a supplement to the amounts we are able to budget for family food purchase. We have conducted a thorough investigation of the distribution under the present plan. Our investigation has revealed that the only commodities which would be regularly available would be white flour, rice, corn meal, and dried skim milk. The nutritive value of these commodities, weighed against the cost of distribution, seem to make the present plan impractical.

Again, we wish you to strongly consider the food stamp plan when it is presented to you. The State Public Welfare Commission tells us from their experience a food stamp plan is a much more practical plan for the distribution of surplus commodities.

Very truly yours,

EVERETT E. METLER,
Chairman, Committee on Surplus Commodities.

SENATE PROCEDURE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn now to another matter.

I had anticipated that the Senate would hold a rather long session today. At least, such was the expectation. Today we were confronted with a unanimous-consent agreement over which I had no control, because it had been entered into rather early last week, which applied to proposed legislation which thereafter became the pending business of the Senate. When that measure became the pending business today, the unanimous consent continued to apply to it. Since I was confronted with a unanimous-consent agreement today; I acommodated myself to it.

However, I wish to say it will be the last unanimous-consent agreement my colleagues will experience for a long, long time—at least, the last one which will be entered into while I am on the floor.

I had announced that if there were an intention to continue to try to do business on this Labor Day, I would speak at great length honoring the institution of Labor Day. But, as I have indicated, I shall not do so now.

I shall make a very brief speech honoring Labor Day. But before I turn to it, I wish to restate my parliamentary position and the reason for following the parliamentary course of action I have followed.

There are three reasons why I intend to continue to follow my parliamentary course of action, criticism to the contrary notwithstanding.

FIRST REASON FOR LEGISLATION SLOWDOWN

It is a mistake for the Congress to adjourn on the eve of the arrival in the United States of the Premier of Russia. As I stated earlier, I was not a party to the invitation to him to come to the United States; and, as I also said before, he would not have been invited that way, if my wishes had been followed. Instead, he would have come to the United States—if, as, and when he came—as a member of an official United Nations' delegation to the United Nations headquarters in New York City, along with the heads of all other states, for the purpose of discussing the great threat to the peace which confronts the world, for the purpose of having the heads of the states—of all nations, large and small—try to reach some honorable understanding which would make it possible to remove, once and for all, the terrible threat of a nuclear war.

I have been heard to say before, and repeat now, the problem of working out a lasting peace is not a matter to be settled by Great Britain, France, the United States, West Germany, and Russia; instead, it must be settled by all the nations of the world, because all the nations of the world have a stake in the great issue of peace or nuclear war.

The President decided on another course of action in regard to an invitation to the Premier of Russia; he decided upon the course of action—as he had a perfect right to do—of extending to the Premier of Russia an invitation to visit the United States.

Mr. President, I am proud of our American democratic institutions. I am proud of our system of self-government, composed at the Federal level of three independent branches of the Government—the executive, the judiciary, and the legislature. I am proud to have the leaders of those countries, from totalitarian areas of the world, observe the operation of self-government as it is administered through these three independent branches.

Sincere men can differ as to the implications which they think are involved; but I hold to the point of view that it would be a great mistake for the Congress not to be in session when the Premier of Russia arrives in this country. I believe we should hold ourselves ready, in session, to be of any service we might be to the President and the State Department, in extending to them any courtesies of protocol which they might find—and who knows now what the developments may be—would be of help to them in extending a protocol reception to the Premier of Russia.

As I said the other day, speaking as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, my own, personal view is that it would be a very good thing—if it met with the pleasure of the executive branch—to have the Premier of Russia appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as did the Deputy Premier, Mr. Mikoyan, and as did Mr. Kozlov, later—for a discussion and a period of questions and answers. I recognize that there are honest differences of opinion among us in regard to that.

But be that as it may, one of the reasons why I believe the Senate should not adjourn sine die on the night of Saturday, September 12, is that from the standpoint of the best possible foreign relations around the world, I believe the Congress should be in session. This would avoid even the remotest basis for any propaganda to the effect that the Congress was guilty of impoliteness of conduct or lack of protocol, despite our professions that we are ready to meet people with ideas contrary to our own.

We should make it clear to the world that we are ready to meet even Khrushchev in accordance with such requests as the President and the State Department might make of us.

SECOND REASON FOR DELAY IN ADJOURNMENT

Second, I do not believe Congress should adjourn on the evening of Saturday, September 12, because, in my opinion, Congress could not adjourn then without being guilty of rushing through and steamrollering through, without giving adequate consideration to, and without having adequate debate on, even the proposed legislation which apparently the leadership contemplates having considered before the adjournment.

That leads me to point out—as I have done in the past, but I wish to reiterate it at this time—that I note that the press continues to seek to give the impression that the course of action I am following is being followed just because I find myself in conflict with the majority leader, because while I was off the floor of the Senate for 2 or 3 minutes, the other day, the majority leader obtained Senate approval of a proposed unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate on the housing bill veto matter.

But, Mr. President, that was only an incident; it was only a small part of the problem which confronts me.

I have made very clear that I do not think a unanimous consent agreement should be entered into—particularly when it is known that a Member of the Senate holds the views which I hold toward unanimous-consent agreements—until a quorum call has been had or until there has been given to any Senator who holds very definite views on unanimous-consent agreements—as I do—notice that it is planned to request an entering into a unanimous-consent agreement.

As I said the other day, no rule requires it; but in the instance, I am discussing I did what every Senator has a right to do; I used procedure commonly used, to have the majority leader notified that I was opposed to a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate on any issue.

Finding that the request that I had asked to be transmitted to the majority leader had not been honored—although the majority leader says he was not aware of it—I thought it important to make clear that I intend to protect my parliamentary rights in the future.

However, I wish to make clear that I think the unanimous-consent procedure has been abused in the Senate. The Senate has almost reached the point where its business cannot be conducted except by unanimous-consent agreement.

In my judgment, it is leading to many evils for the Senate. It is changing, really, the nature of this body from the body which was designed by our forefathers to be a deliberative, debating body. The Senate was designed as a body where men's minds would be made up on the floor of the Senate by evidence and facts, where men's minds would be changed here during the course of debate on the basis of the evidence, rather than by way of commitments and understandings made on the floor of the Senate.

I believe it is the best interest of the United States that we return to the early, historic purpose of the Senate, namely, that it be a deliberative body where decisions are reached here on the floor of the Senate.

As I said before, we all know what happens when we permit a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate in the Senate and to fix a time certain to vote. It brings this body to an end, for all intents and purposes, as a deliberative body. Therefore, I repeat the notice I served the other day: It is going to have to be a very rare situation, an extraordinary situation, that will cause me to give unanimous consent to limit debate and fix a time certain to vote.

THIRD REASON FOR DELIBERATE ACTION PRIOR TO ADJOURNMENT

My third reason is that I think the public interest demands that we stay here beyond September 12 to consider a whole series of very important items of legislation which the Congress owes it to the American people to vote upon before adjournment.

I speak most respectfully, but the time schedule will speak for itself. When I think of the slow bell, when I think of the easygoing way we function around here, from the standpoint of a time schedule, for weeks, Mr. President, in the early part of this session, I am not the least bit moved now by any urging that we ought to speed up.

The Senate needs to adopt some common sense rules of procedure. I have advocated a set of procedural reforms for the Senate of the United States since 1947. I take only a moment to give the broad outlines of them tonight. We would not get into this great speed-up situation at the end of each session of the Senate if we had some rules of procedure which provided for orderly consideration of business from the first day the Senate convened in January of a given year on through to final adjournment.

It just is not common sense for us to be holding the Senate in session when committees are also in session, usually with 5 or 10 men here on the floor of the Senate, day in and day out, week in and week out. We all know it certainly does not make a good public impression.

It was in 1947, I believe, when I first proposed what we ought to do is try to agree upon a sensible business schedule, an orderly time schedule, for running the Senate.

I suggested we agree that in the first part of the session the Senate convene at 9 o'clock in the morning, run to about 12:30, and take up again at 2 o'clock, giving us an hour and a half for lunch, and continuing in session to 5 or such time thereafter as we might decide, in our judgment and wisdom, to continue in session that day.

Mr. President, this custom of having the Senate in session while we rush down to the dining room, eat under great pressure and haste, come back up, only to ask, "What happened when I was away? What happened during the lunch hour?" makes no sense. A high school debating society knows better than to try to run itself in that way.

I also suggested that that schedule be adopted, for the first part of the session, for Mondays and Wednesdays; and that committees meet on Tuesdays, Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays for those who might wish to meet on Saturdays, with the understanding, of course, that if an emergency situation should develop, the leadership could call us into floor session.

Then, Mr. President, I have suggested that, as the session gets older and the committees start completing their work, the Senate meet on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, and that the committees meet on Tuesdays and Fridays, until finally we get down to the point where usually a committee would need only 1 day of the week.

Be that as it may, Mr. President, I think it is important that we try to modify our time schedule in the Senate so as to avoid this "great, mad rush" at the end of each session of Congress. It has been my observation, as the result of my 15 years of service in the Senate, that those are the days when one needs to be on guard against bad legislation.

It is also my observation that unanimous-consent agreements have a tendency to make bad legislation worse, because too frequently one finds himself limited and handicapped by a very strict unanimous-consent agreement which simply does not provide the time necessary, when some unexpected point is raised with respect to the merits of some issue, to discuss thoroughly the proposal.

I should like to stress this point, Mr. President, because I think many do not understand this particular reason for the course of action the Senator from Oregon is following. Mr. President, I reflect upon no one. I stated only my personal feelings about this matter.

I have tried to be cooperative in the Senate. I will not take the time to detail my acts of cooperation, but they are legion. Yet I have been a little disappointed, Mr. President, at the frequency with which the Senator from Oregon from time to time has found himself on rather the short end of the stick, so to speak. I was very much disappointed by what took place in the Senate earlier this year, since there was no great emergency facing the Senate at the time. Through no fault of our own, but because we were not protected procedurally, several of us missed important votes on a tax bill.

I had been appointed by appropriate officials of the Senate, along with several of my colleagues who are members of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations which deals with American-Canadian affairs to conduct official business in Canada. The same problem confronted the members of some subcommittees of other committees who also went to Canada at the time of the St. Lawrence Seaway opening. In my case, Mr. President, I went to that opening as incidental to the main purpose of my trip to Canada. I went there as a working member of a working subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations assigned to the task of meeting with a subcommittee of the Canadian Parliament to consider officially, as Government business, some of the perplexing problems which exist between Canada and the United States.

Mr. President, I simply took it for granted that since we were going on the official trip at least pairs would be arranged—or, better still, since there was no reason in fact, on the basis of any emergency legislation pending before the Senate, that on that particular day the Senate would not be in session.

I am speaking about the matter publicly, although I will say, Mr. President, there are others who have had some rather definite things to say about it off the floor of the Senate.

I was completely surprised that we were not given the parliamentary protection I think we were obviously entitled to have; either live pairs on our votes, or, since it would have been more appropriate, a recess of the session during that day, because there were a great many Members of this body who were absent on official business that day.

Those things happen. One takes a look at the situation and one says to oneself, "It is about time for me to start protecting myself on my parliamentary rights."

In my judgment, Mr. President, those of us who made that trip on official business of the Senate, appointed by the leadership of the Senate to perform that function for the Senate and for the Government, were entitled to a little better parliamentary treatment than we were subjected to on that occasion.

I cite that only as one example. There are others I could cite. I do not intend to belabor the RECORD tonight, but I will cite the cases whenever the matter becomes an issue, I assure Senators.

PROTECTION OF PARLIAMENTARY RIGHTS

Mr. President, when one is a liberal in this body one needs to keep in mind the lesson I learned a very short time after I first came to this body in 1945. I have said this on another occasion. I learned the lesson from the great liberal who was then sitting in this body, Robert M. La Follette, Jr., of Wisconsin. To me, he was known affectionately as "Young Bob." I grew up with him as a boy; in fact, I showed ponies against him as a boy year after year at the Dane County fairs in Wisconsin.

On the occasion to which I refer, I had just made my first major speech in the Senate. In the speech I made a plea for some general welfare legislation, because I happen to hold to the point of view, as a liberal, that the primary function of this Government of ours is to promote the general welfare of the people. That is what this Republic was set up to do, and I think the constitutional fathers made it perfectly clear in the great organic law they wrote.

After I finished that speech "Young Bob" came up to me, and I shall never forget the lesson he taught me. He said, "You marked yourself today as a liberal. There will be those in the Senate who will do what they can to make things tough for you in the Senate. My suggestion to you is that you familiarize yourself with the rules of the Senate and do what every liberal must do—protect your parliamentary rights. If you do not protect your parliamentary rights you will find yourself taken advantage of and in difficulty many times."

I wish to say to my present liberal colleagues in the Senate, Mr. President, that is a lesson they need to learn also, if they have not already learned it.

The history of liberalism in the Senate is the history of the days of the great liberals whose footsteps we cannot fill, albeit we can do our best to try to walk in the imprints they have left on the carpet in this great Chamber. History shows that those liberals stood together in respect to the protection of the parliamentary rights of any one of them, because they recognized it might be one today and another tomorrow who would need protection. They recognized, Mr. President, that even though they might, as liberals, disagree on the merits of some substantive legislative issue, there was one point on which they had better not be found in disagreement, which was the point of protecting the parliamentary rights of each one of them.

Mr. President, the rules were written in the rules of the Senate, in my judgment, to protect minorities in the Senate from the conduct of a majority which sought at any time to trample upon the rights of the minority.

These rules were written into the rules of the Senate, Mr. President, to prevent "steamroller tactics," to assure full debate, and also to give the country time to reflect upon the merits of any issue which is pending before the Senate and to be heard from before the final vote is taken.

Consider, for a moment, the most recent veto of the housing bill. It so happens that I think the veto message of the second housing bill raised a series of problems far beyond the significance of a housing bill itself. It raised some great questions of political science. The liberals in this body ought to have pondered long as to the course of action to be followed when confronted, as we have been confronted, with a series of vetoes by the President. These vetoes are rapidly turning the Congress of the United States into a legislative body by veto. I am afraid it is true that too much of our legislation is now being compromised and adjusted and trimmed to comply with threats of a veto. I do not think, Mr. President, there is any justification at any time for changing one's course of action in regard to passing legislation simply because somebody says, "If you leave that in, the bill is going to be vetoed."

I do not believe in legislating under threat, Mr. President, although I believe that the President has the constitutional duty to carry out his veto power when in his conscience he believes he ought to do so. It is one of the great checks of the Constitution.

We have the duty as Senators to pass legislation which we think ought to be passed in the public interest. If the President wishes to veto it, he has the right to do so, and we have the duty then to consider whether or not there is merit in his veto. If there is merit in the veto, we should modify our language accordingly, but if there is not, we should try to override the veto. If we cannot override, we have the duty to repass the legislation if we still think it is as good as when we first voted on it, and to send it back to the President and let him take a second thought and a second look at it.

"Oh," it is said, "but that could go on indefinitely." No, Mr. President, because the time comes when we make a final decision, and if we think the legislation is still meritorious, we take it to the people. We let the people decide at the ballot box at the first opportunity what the course of action shall be. Let the people decide whether the President or the Congress shall be vetoed. Be that as it may, the point I am making is that this session of Congress has demonstrated over and over again that we have not been passing the legislation which we really believe to be the legislation we ought to pass. Too often we have been passing legislation by yielding to the threat of a veto. I do not think the American people in 1958 elected an overwhelming majority of Democrats to Congress to function that way legislatively.

So, Mr. President, this point is involved, too, in the position which I have taken in protecting my parliamentary rights in the Senate and in urging a go-slow program here in the closing days until we can take a long, hard look at some of the legislation which the people of the country have a right to have us pass before adjournment.

NEEDED LEGISLATION

Let me name some of that legislation.

First, I think we ought to pass minimum-wage legislation. We have pending before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare a set of amendments to the minimum-wage law. The subcommittee has reported it. I have the honor to be a member of that subcommittee, whose chairman is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. President, I am one of two cosponsors in the Senate, along with Representative ROOSEVELT in the House, of this set of minimum-wage modification proposals. I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated in the RECORD, without my taking the time to read it, a summary analysis of S. 1046, the minimum-wage amendment bill of which Senator KENNEDY and I are coauthors, which was introduced in the House by Representative ROOSEVELT. I ask that the summary analysis of this bill be incorporated at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the summary analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Summary analysis of S. 1046 as reported from Subcommittee on Labor

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on March 25, 1959, I engaged in a radio broadcast with Senator KENNEDY in regard to the main features of our minimum wage bill. I ask unanimous consent that what we said on that occasion be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the radio broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO BROADCAST, MARCH 25, 1959, SENATORS MORSE AND KENNEDY ON LABOR REFORM AND MINIMUM WAGE

Senator MORSE. Fellow Oregonians, I am delighted to have as my guest on the broadcast today Senator KENNEDY, of Massachusetts. I want to say that one of my prides in the Senate is that I can call Senator KENNEDY friend because he is a warm personal friend and I have a very high regard for him. I think he is one of the great statesmen in America today. Senator KENNEDY, as you know, was the author last year of the labor bill that passed the Senate but failed to pass in the House of Representatives. Once again this year, he is the author of the labor reform bill which is known as the Kennedy-Ervin bill and I am proud to be one of the cosponsors of this bill. In fact, I am proud to be one of the cosponsors of the Kennedy minimum wage bill. That is known as the Kennedy-Morse bill. Before this program is over, I hope Senator KENNEDY will make some comments on that bill but in this broadcast I want him to stress the Kennedy-Ervin bill and tell what its purposes really are. Senator KENNEDY, it's a great pleasure to have you on this program with me.

Senator KENNEDY. WAYNE, I'm delighted to be on here and to talk to the people of the State from which you come. Every trip I've made to your State has been as your guest so that I'm delighted to once again have an opportunity through you to visit your State.

Senator MORSE. Well, I'm pleased to have you as my guest this morning, and will you proceed now, Senator, to tell the people of Oregon what we're trying to accomplish in the Kennedy-Ervin bill this year.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I think in a general way we're attempting to make it unprofitable for racketeers and hoodlums and those who prey off the labor-management movement of this country to continue. We're anxious to strengthen the labor movement in this country. We're not anxious under the guise of reform to pass legislation which will weaken labor's position at the bargaining table. Rather we're attempting to make it an honest and responsible union and attempting to provide by Federal legislation that the principles of the ethical practices code of the AFL–CIO will become national law.

Senator MORSE. Senator, I have been saying to the people of Oregon as I've discussed your bill that what we seek to do is place penalties on wrongdoers who have wormed their way into positions of union leadership and have betrayed the trust that they owe the membership of the union, rather than pass a piece of legislation that seeks to penalize the membership of the union. For example, in our bill, the Kennedy bill this year, we again provide that the penalty shall be on the individual wrongdoer rather than to deny to the union its rights before the National Labor Relations Board because it has discovered that it has some union official that has betrayed its trust. Would you comment on that?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I think that the chief distinction between the administration Goldwater bill and the bill which we have sponsored has been in the penalties. We provide that it would be necessary, for example, for all union officials to disclose how they deal publicly with the money which is entrusted to them. If they make a false report or they do not report, or if they destroy the records or mutilate them on which an honest report would be based, then they are subject to criminal penalties. The Goldwater bill would provide that, in addition to the union officer who is guilty of being subject to a criminal penalty, the union members themselves who are guiltless in this case would be denied the use of the National Labor Relations Board in order to protect themselves against unfair labor practices, and so forth. This seems to me to be totally unfair and I think it represents a spirit along with other amendments which indicate that the cry for reform is being used as a means of lessening the rights of honest union members rather than merely pinpointing penalties against the wrongdoers.

Senator MORSE. Well, I want to say to this Oregon audience that Senator KENNEDY has stood out against attempts to substitute for his bill legislation that would penalize unions rather than penalize the wrongdoers within unions and in our argument in committee, I use by way of analogy this argument. Would the administration supporters agree to passage of legislation that would deny to a corporation, for example, its rights before the courts of this country because it was discovered that it had some corporation official that had proved to be a crook? Of course, at once the administration leaders on the committee agree that you couldn't do that to a corporation but they still wanted to deny unions rights before the National Labor Relations Board because it might be discovered that some racketeer had worked into some union. Senator KENNEDY is deserving of great credit for standing out against that kind of legislation.

Senator KENNEDY. I think the punishment should fit the crime and I think in our bill, it does.

Senator MORSE. Do you think, Senator, it is fair to say that your bill seeks to carry out a principle of good government, namely that full public disclosure helps clean up a lot of bad doings within a democracy and that your bill is really a public disclosure bill, for example, of the use of union funds, the sources of income, any evidence of conflict of interest within the union? We're making a public record required under this bill so that the individual union members can get from the Department of Labor the facts in regard to the operation of their union. Do you think that is a fair analysis of your bill?

Senator KENNEDY. That's right. And then by providing that there shall be secret elections for union officers and that there shall be full protection to various candidates to put themselves forward, that there shall be adequate notice of meetings, that there shall be protection against reprisals. We give the union members the right to exercise their democratic rights. I think it might be worth while to very quickly indicate the major provisions.

Senator MORSE. I wish you would.

Senator KENNEDY. One is to provide for the disclosure of uses to which union moneys are put. Secondly, we provide a prohibition, as you suggested, against a conflict of interest where a union leader may own a piece of a company with which he is bargaining collectively on behalf of the employees. Three, we prohibit employers from paying off union leaders in order to get a contract and substandard wages. Fourth, we provide for secret elections and for democratic procedures within the unions at regularly appointed times. And then we make it impossible for felons to come out of prison and assume positions of importance and responsibility within the union movement. Next, we provide a limitation of 18 months on so-called trusteeships by which an international union can seize control of the assets and the organization of a local union and thereby maintain a tremendous control over all the locals throughout the country. By putting a limitation of 18 months, we will provide a protection against this abuse. I would think that this is, as you have frequently stated, a bill of rights for union members. We can provide the framework. In the final analysis, we hope this will make it possible for the union members to exercise their rights and meet their responsibilities.

Senator MORSE. Senator, there's one phase of this bill I'd like to have you comment on because you were of great help to me in regard to an amendment I offered. It may not be the final form that our proposal will take but at least it's a step forward. Remember I told the committee the other day about a Salem, Oreg., businessman running a plumbing establishment who came into my office and pointed out that he couldn't get any help from the National Labor Relations Board because his case was one of these that the Board wouldn't take jurisdiction over. It was in the so-called no man's land area. Neither the State nor the Federal Government would take jurisdiction over the case. You will remember that I used that as an example in support of the amendment I offered which would authorize the National Labor Relations Board to delegate to the States jurisdiction over the cases that the National Board won't take jurisdiction over provided the State will set up a State labor relations board and that State labor relations board in regard to these so-called Federal cases will follow Federal standards. Would you tell this Oregon audience your opinion of at least the objectives of my amendment although you and I are agreed that we are going to perfect it when it gets to the floor of the Senate, if possible.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, one of the big problems in labor relations has been that there have been thousands of small employers and hundreds of thousands of working people who are so small, at least in their effect on commerce, that the National Labor Relations Board has refused to assume jurisdiction but that the States have not been able because it has been in Federal interstate commerce. These people have been in what is called, as you say, no man's land. Now the problem has been that some people have been reluctant to have the States assume jurisdiction because most States have been unable to do so. They have no State labor board and they don't want the Federal Government because it puts an overwhelming burden on the five-man National Labor Relations Board. Now you have in your amendment, I think, suggested the best solution. That is, we will permit these State boards to be set up and to exercise the principles of the national law in dealing with these cases. I think it represents a rather unique partnership between the State and Federal Government recognizing the basic rights of both and most importantly dealing with this problem of employers and employees in this area who have been denied this equal protection of the law. I have great hopes that your amendment will be accepted on the floor because I think it's the best of all the proposals, better than the one that I originally had in this bill, much better than the administration's, and I would think that this would perhaps be one of the most significant parts of this bill.

Senator MORSE. Well, I want to thank you for the great help you gave to me in regard to the amendment.

Now in the closing minutes of this broadcast, I'd like to have you tell the Oregon audience something about the Kennedy-Morse minimum wage bill.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, WAYNE, we're going to start now in the middle of April, having finished this job, on hearings on our bill to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 and extend the coverage of the minimum wage to 7 million people who are today not covered. I think you and I share the very strong conviction that no one should have to work in the United States for 40 hours, for today they have to work in many cases including my own area of New England, for less than $40. Now there are many millions of people, and most of them women, most of them working in rather large stores, who today receive less than $1 an hour for a 40-hour week. We want to bring them under the coverage of the minimum wage and we want to raise the minimum wage on those who are already covered and I think you and I are of the strong conviction that no American should have to work for 40 hours for less than $50 a week today.

Senator MORSE. What I think it means, Senator, is that you and I are such firm supporters of the private enterprise system that we're saying to American industry and the American people, our system of enlightened capitalism can afford a decent minimum wage for every person no matter what his occupation may be. Isn't that putting it rather straightly?

Senator KENNEDY. That is certainly correct and I think that we realize that it's impossible for any American to live in the way that we think they ought to live if you're going to pay them a wage of less than $45 or $50 a week. They endure and survive but they don't really live in the way we want them to live and I don't think anyone should continue in business, and make a profit, and serve the public while paying their people a substandard wage.

Senator MORSE. Well, I happen to know some of the evidence that's going to be brought before our committee and the American people are going to be surprised to discover that in some occupations not now covered by the minimum wage, the present wages are far below the $1 an hour. We are making progress. I remember back in 1939, I was chairman of the Paper Products Industry Board. In those days, you had a committee come to Washington and take testimony and then make a recommendation as to what the minimum wage should be and I remember that they were trying to justify in 1939, 25 cents an hour in some of the paper products plants of this country. So we have come a long way but there's still a way to go.

Senator KENNEDY. We're talking about big companies, not the corner store. We're talking about companies that have a business of a million dollars and there's no reason why they shouldn't pay a decent wage to Americans who work in their stores.

Senator MORSE. We were talking in that instance about the paper industry, for example. Well, in closing this broadcast, Senator KENNEDY, again I want to thank you and I want to say we want you back in Oregon soon. It's always a great pleasure for us to have you there and I am very happy to present this broadcast to the people of Oregon this coming week with you as my guest. This is WAYNE MORSE reporting from Washington, D.C. Until next week, at the same time, the same station, I bid you goodby.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think we should stay in session next week or the week after, if necessary, in order to take action in the Senate on minimum wage legislation.

I know the argument will be made, "But the House may not wish to take action." That is the business of the House. I do not think we should cut our legislative cloth in the Senate in order to fit the House. I think we ought to cut our legislative cloth in the Senate in order to fit the responsibilities of the Senate and let the House decide for itself.

Second, I do not think that we can justify adjourning without passing some civil rights legislation of substance. As we know, some legislation on civil rights is awaiting action in the Committee on the Judiciary. I think at least a great effort should be made to pass some civil rights legislation, and I think we ought to stay in session after September 12 to give consideration to that subject matter.

Third, we still have a housing legislation problem before us. It is awaiting further action at the present time in the Committee on Banking and Currency. It has had two Presidential vetoes. We should stay in session long enough to give thorough and not just superficial consideration to housing legislation.

Fourth, as I said on Saturday, but will not repeat at length today, I do not see how we can possibly avoid our responsibility of passing legislation in the field of education.

Mr. President, we cannot afford, in my judgment, to let the present educational situation in this country go unattended by way of Federal legislation. We ought to stay in session until we pass a Federal aid to education bill.

Fifth, I think we should give some consideration to the Humphrey resolution in regard to the World Court. As the record will show, for years and years I have taken the position that Arthur Vandenberg was right when in those great historic speeches, while he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations or the ranking minority member of that committee, he said with his great eloquence that there is no hope for peace in the world until the nations of the world set up a system of international justice through law for the settlement of issues which threaten the peace.

There is pending before the appropriate committee of the Senate the Humphrey resolution on the World Court. It seeks to repeal the Connally amendment to the Morse resolution of 1945, which was a resolution I had submitted and which was adopted by the Senate, and which pledged our country to the compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court. The Connally amendment proposed that it should not apply to any domestic issue. It has always been my position as a lawyer that under international law it would not apply anyway to a domestic issue.

There is a legal argument as to whether or not the World Court has jurisdiction to determine the question of jurisdiction in the face of such a pledge of compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court. In my judgment it has. Any court has the power to determine its jurisdiction within the legislation of reference which sets up the court in the first instance. However, there are many people who think that the Connally amendment is a great handicap to the functioning of the World Court. I have never shared that point of view. Since that view is held by so many people, including many distinguished lawyers, I heartily support the Humphrey amendment which seeks to repeal the Connally amendment.

I believe we can settle that matter in not more than 2 days of debate in the Senate. I believe we ought to get it settled because it is one of the greatest appeals we have to the free nations of the world by way of proof that the United States of America seeks a peaceful course of action in the settlement of troublesome issues which threaten the peace of the world.

I wish to point out that in November in Australia the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference will be held again. The United States will be invited as a guest. I have been advised by the Secretary General of that conference that one of the major topics of discussion will be the whole subject of the place of the World Court in the settlement of international disputes which threaten the peace of the world.

I should like to see our country in a position in that conference in November of being able to stand up proudly and say, "We have committed ourselves to the compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court, and we have made our commitment perfectly clear by repealing the Connally amendment."

Sixth, I believe we should take action before we adjourn on the plugging of tax loopholes, including amendments on (a) the 4 percent dividend credit; (b) the 27½ percent oil depletion allowance; (c) procedures for collection of taxes on interest and dividends at the source; (d) reexamination of tax advantages under the capital gains plan; and (e) nonlegitimate business expense deductions.

Seventh, I think we should take some action on unemployment compensation. There has been a considerable amount of legislation on that subject pending. If we really mean it, when we pass a resolution here, as we did a few minutes ago, with nice sounding phraseology of our high regard for American labor, the best way to manifest our high regard for American labor would be to do social and economic justice to American labor. Unemployment compensation legislation would do just that. We should stay in session until we pass it.

Eighth, farm legislation. What has happened to all the promises of the Democratic Party and those made in the Congress of the United States about what we were going to do in this session with respect to adequate farm legislation? I speak respectfully, Mr. President. The Democrats are going to have to go home to the precincts of their districts and their States without having made a record showing they have kept faith with their big, high-sounding promises about what they were going to do with respect to farm legislation. It is no answer to me to say, "With Benson still Secretary of Agriculture, if the Senate had passed such legislation, the President would have vetoed it anyway." I think that is probably true, but does that mean we should not have taken action? Does that mean we should substitute the President of the United States for the Congress of the United States? We should have passed some farm legislation, and we ought to stay in session until we do.

Ninth, we ought to pass a clean election law. We should do it this session. The 1960 election is coming. We Democrats made some promises about a clean election law, and we ought to pass some legislation on the subject.

Tenth, the constitutional amendment giving equal rights to women is before us. I see no reason why we should not face up to that subject and decide the matter one way or the other.

Eleventh, we have awaiting action the extension of the International Wheat Agreement Act of 1949.

Twelfth, juvenile delinquency legislation should be passed in this session.

Thirteenth, there is pending on the calendar some small business legislation that needs immediate action.

Fourteenth, water pollution legislation. This legislation is one of the most important domestic issues we have. It affects the welfare of the people in many areas of the country. People are suffering from pollution which could be remedied by adequate antipollution legislation. We owe it to them to pass such legislation.

Fifteenth, legislation dealing with Federal contributions in lieu of taxes, as now pending on the calendar.

Sixteenth, the amendment to the Transportation of Explosives Act, which was reported the other day by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. President, I speak with some feeling and great concern about this legislation. I talked about it at some length a few days ago on the floor of the Senate and urged action by our Interstate Commerce Committee. The Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] is the author of the bill. I proposed immediate action on this legislation which the Senate once before, in an earlier Congress, passed. However, it became bogged down in the House of Representatives. Had a law on this subject been on the statute books, the probabilities are that the great catastrophe which occurred in Roseburg, Oreg., on August 7, might have been avoided. On that day many city blocks of Roseburg were devastated and a good many people were killed bacause a truck driver for a private concern, not a common carrier, parked his truck in the middle of the town and a fire occurred in the building next to it. The fire caused the truck, which was loaded with very highly explosive material, to explode, causing great damage. Such a catastrophe could happen in any town in the State of any Senator. The evidence is perfectly clear that if we adopt the same regulatory legislation for the handling of vehicles carrying explosives that we now require of interstate common carriers, we will greatly reduce the danger of a repetition of such an explosion as occurred in Roseburg, Oreg.

Seventeenth, I think we ought to debate—and I think there is a possibility of Senate approval—the constitutional amendment to repeal the poll tax.

Eighteenth, I think we ought to debate before we adjourn—and I believe there is a possibility we might obtain approval—the proposed constitutional amendment to give national representation to residents of the District of Columbia.

Nineteenth, I think we ought to give consideration to legislation to require disclosure of income from all sources by Members of Congress and the top executive officials of the Government.

Senators have heard me say before that in a democracy there is no substitute for full public disclosure of matters that involve the public interest. For years and years I have fought for public disclosure legislation requiring disclosure of the incomes of Members of Congress and other Government officials. I believe we should take some action on that measure.

Twentieth, legislation to expand timber access roads, a subject on which I have talked many times in the Senate, but which is particularly needed now in view of what is happening to some segments of the lumber industry.

Twenty-first, health insurance for the elderly as a part of the social security program.

Mr. President, I think we should discuss, debate, and, I hope, vote upon the Forand-Morse bill, which seeks to provide medical care to elderly people under the social security system. I do not think we should adjourn until we do so. Judging from my mail, there is no doubt about the fact that this proposed legislation has tremendous support across the country.

ACTION IMPERATIVE ON BILLS PENDING IN THE HOUSE

Then we have certain legislation which has passed the Senate but which is pending in the House. We ought to give the House adequate time to pass on this legislation. I understand from a reliable source that if we go forward with the rush program which is contemplated by a sine die adjournment on Saturday night, September 12, there is very little chance any of the legislation which we have already passed in the Senate will be considered in the House this year.

First, there is the District of Columbia home rule bill.

Second, legislation to relieve economically depressed areas.

Third, the Youth Conservation Corps bill.

Fourth, post-Korea GI benefit bill.

Mr. President, I do not want the impression to be formed by anyone that I think these are the only bills we ought to consider before we adjourn. Also I do not wish to leave the impression we should stay in session until each and every one of those bills is considered. I realize that would be unreasonable. But if the Senate remained in session another 2 weeks, we could handle a good many of them. If we stayed in session another 2 weeks, I think we would be demonstrating the determination on the part of the Congress to carry out the legislative rights and needs of the American people to the best of our ability, before we go home. We could then get our instructions from our constituents. Perhaps it would then be a good idea to come back the latter part of November and take up where we left off, and go on to finish the other pieces of legislation in the list of pending proposed legislation I have outlined.

THE LABOR DAY SESSION

I turn to the last subject matter I am going to take up. The majority leader today in discussing the meeting of the Senate on this Labor Day called attention to the historic record of the Senate in regard to meeting on Labor Day. He did not go back as far as I did in my speech in the Senate on September 5, which is to be found on page 18227 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Since the majority leader made his comments earlier today on this subject, I wish to repeat what I said the other day, for there can be no question about the facts of the statement I make.

Labor Day was established as a legal holiday in 1894. Since 1894 the Senate has been in session 19 times through Labor Day. On 19 occasions since 1894 the sine die adjournment came after Labor Day. But since 1894 the Senate has met on Labor Day only three times. The first time the Senate met on Labor Day was in 1913. The Labor Day meeting in that year was due to President Wilson's calling the 63d Congress into extraordinary session in April instead of waiting until December, when a new Congress ordinarily met. He told the Congress the 1912 election was a mandate they should act on promptly and not wait for more than a year.

The great debates of that period were on the creation of the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Trade Commission. This was the great progressive legislative program of Woodrow Wilson, which was then under consideration. Of course, at that time the President had some legislative problems too. A long session had been held, and it had been a highly controversial one. It was decided that the Senate should remain in session on that Labor Day in 1913, but the House of Representatives was not in session on that day.

In 1918 both Houses of Congress met on Labor Day. I do not believe I need point out to the Senate that in 1918 our Nation was in the midst of war, and it was highly desirable that the Senate meet on that Labor Day because of the war emergency which confronted the Nation. But no such emergency confronts the Nation on this day in 1959.

In 1942, the Senate met on Labor Day, again in the midst of war.

In 1945, the Senate took a recess from August 1 to September 5, and during that time the Labor Day holiday occurred.

So, Mr. President, by meeting on Labor Day the Senate has acted quite contrary to the general historic pattern of Senate precedent in regard to Labor Day. I respectfully submit that there is no emergency in this Nation today which justified the Senate's meeting. Let us be frank about it. We met today because of the great push to adjourn next Saturday night.

A better way in which we could have honored labor today would have been to be in recess, meeting with labor at the crossroads of America, to discuss some of the implications, for example, of what, in my personal view, was the unfortunate labor bill which was passed by Congress last week. It was a bill upon which we should have followed a different course of action. But I do not intend to permit to remain unanswered any allegation or representation to the American people that it was because of any emergency need that the Senate met in session today.

The only piece of proposed legislation which the Senate passed today—and that under a unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into early last week—was the agricultural food bill. This certainly could not be considered as an emergency measure which had, by all means, to be passed today, failing which some great harm would have befallen this Republic.

I think the holding of the session today, in view of the known commitments which some Senators had made, was wrong. Some Senators kept those commitments and were not present today. I do not think it was fair to them to place them in a situation where they could not be here to vote, and thus cause them to blemish their voting records, as they have been blemished today.

I do not think it was either fair or reasonable that the Senate be held in session today, as it was. I objected to it. I have no apologies to make to anyone for exercising my parliamentary rights in following the course of action which I took, which limited the activity of the Senate, so far as the transaction of business was concerned, to the agricultural bill and to the adoption of the so-called labor concurrent resolution.

I believe a much more fitting tribute to organized labor should be made than that which is symbolized by the concurrent resolution which was adopted. Although I had intended to read, if necessary, from a series of great works, one book being entitled "Theory of the Labor Movement," by Selig Perlman, the second entitled "History of Trade Unionism in the United States," also written by Selig Perlman, and another, a three-volume work entitled "History of Labor in the United States," of which Selig Perlman was one of the coauthors, I shall not read from any of those works tonight.

However, I reserve the right to discuss this matter at a later date, when I think it will be just as appropriate, if I decide it is desirable to do so.

TRIBUTE TO PROFESSOR PERLMAN

I simply wish to say this about Selig Perlman. I gave a eulogy concerning him a few days ago, because only recently Selig Perlman, who I think is generally recognized by labor scholars in the United States as having been one of the three or four greatest labor economists of our time, has passed away. He, together with Prof. Ed Witte, of the University of Wisconsin, was one of my graduate professors in the study of labor economics. American scholarship has lost one of its great intellects with the passing of Selig Perlman. I think it is particularly fitting on this Labor Day, that I should pay this homage to him. He not only was a great intellect, a great labor economist, but he was a great human being, and one of the most magnificent teachers at whose feet I ever sat. He was a source of great inspiration. It was a high privilege to sit at his feet hour after hour, at seminars and in them to experience, and to observe the workings of that mind of genius. The volumes to which I refer are monuments to his great life.

CONTRIBUTION OF FRANK GRAHAM

In honor of the great American labor movement today I shall quote from one of the most beautiful treaties I have ever read on the significance and symbolism of the free trade union movement in this country. It was written by a former Member of this body, one of the great men living in America today. In fact, when he took his seat in this body it seemed for a while that his seat would be challenged. I was then sitting on the Republican side of the aisle, and he was to be seated on the Democratic side of the aisle, but I answered the major attack which was made upon him in this body, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show. I refer, of course, to the great Frank Graham, former president of the University of North Carolina, a former public member of the National War Labor Board during World War II, and later, for a period of time, a U.S. Senator from the great State of North Carolina.

In my defense of Frank Graham in the Senate, because I had come to know him on the War Labor Board and had come to love him, I said, as the RECORD will show, and as I repeat tonight, that Frank Graham was one of the most Christlike men I have ever known. During World War II, the economy of this country was rocked by the famous Little Steel case. It was of the utmost importance to the successful prosecution of the war that the Little Steel case be settled; that it be settled fairly and impartially; and that it be settled without resort to any economic action on the part of either labor or management. The War Labor Board undertook that grave responsibility.

It was my privilege to take a very active part in the settlement of that dispute, as the decision of the Board shows. The case was divided into a series of issues, which were assigned to certain ones of us on the Board to cover through written opinions, which were then submitted to the Board for vote and approval.

In that decision—and I shall not take the time to read it in detail—the great and able George Taylor, of the Wharton School of Finance, of the University of Pennsylvania, who was a member of the Public Division of the Board, was assigned the task of writing the opinion on the wage issue. Dr. Graham was given the assignment of writing the opinion on the issue of union status; and I was given the assignment of writing the opinions on the issue of the minimum-wage guarantee and the issue relating to the jurisdiction of the Board.

I wish to read from the opinion written by Dr. Graham on the issue of union status. It constitutes my tribute to organized labor on this historic Labor Day. When I finish reading this very brief opinion, I shall yield the floor.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I shall read only the part of Dr. Graham's opinion on the issue of union status that deals with his views in regard to the symbolism of labor in a democracy.

Dr. Graham wrote this opinion under the heading "The Labor Union as the Fourth Chapter in Rise of Democracy."

Mr. President, all that I shall state from now on will be a direct quotation from what I regard one of the greatest statements on the significance, the true meaning, and the symbolism of a free trade union.

I read now from the statement by Dr. Graham:

THE LABOR UNION AS THE FOURTH CHAPTER IN RISE OF DEMOCRACY

High on Hitler's list of the institutions of democracy early marked for the destruction necessary to clear the way for the rise of the Nazi dictatorship were and are the church, the parliament, the corporation, and the labor union. These four institutions are the focal motive force of the four main chapters in the rise of human freedom. The freedom of human beings to organize in autonomous groups has been won through long struggles in the fields of religion, politics, business, and labor.

The power of the great Roman Empire struck down the unrecognized and despised organizations of early Christians but the little congregations of lowly believers became the church universal, which transformed the sackable city of Rome into the unsackable city of God, transmitted the ancient learning, resynthesized Western culture, built the cathedrals, founded the universities, and despite all its faults and failures, with its Hebraic-Christian conception of the brothers of men and the sons of God, has been for the longest period the most beneficent organization in history. The church, in its turn of predominance, tried to block the rise to absolute power of the new autonomous nations within the ecclesiastical dominion. Then the new absolute national monarchies, having become entrenched in independent power, sought to check the rise to increasing power of the autonomous organization of the people's representatives in Parliament. Yet Parliament won its struggle for collective bargaining with the King, and their written agreement became the English Bill of Rights, which, since 1689, has been the charter of constitutional government for all nations which have followed the traditions of the English-speaking peoples.

It was historically logical that the democratic idea of autonomous organization, which achieved victories in the fields of religion and politics, should become an issue in the fields of commerce and industry. The commercial and industrial revolutions created successively the commercial and industrial middle classes, which, through autonomous corporations, soon established their dominant positions in modern society. The corporations helped to overthrow feudal serfdom and gathered the savings of people anywhere in the service of people everywhere. The English Parliament having become a stronghold of the commercial and industrial leaders, and an instrument of corporate power, prohibited workingmen from organizing in behalf of better conditions of life and labor. The struggle of industrial workers to organize and win the relucant recognition of legislative bodies, the courts, and the corporations, is the latest chapter in the democratic struggle of human beings for autonomous organization around a great human need. The movement of working people against heavy odds to win a simple share in the control of their own lives is one of the great human movements of the last hundred years and is at the center of the struggle for freedom and democracy in our time.

The freedom and independence of the labor union is of the essence of historic Americanism. The little band of religious Pilgrims who, in seeking the right to organize for the worship of God without the consent of king or bishop, after many vicissitudes in a foreign land and across uncharted seas still clinging to their principles of piety and autonomous religious organization, fetched up on the wintry shores of Massachusetts where their spiritual heroism made Plymouth Rock one of the foundation stones of self-government in America. One year before the Pilgrims reached American shores, Sir Edwin Sandys led a movement in the London Company to recognize the self-organization of the settlers in Virginia. The less far-sighted businessmen said it would ruin the business enterprise to give these workingmen the right to share in the regulation of their conditions of life and labor. But the intelligent idealism of Sir Edwin Sandys prevailed over the fears of the more practical minded businessmen. Thus was born the first representative assembly in the New World. The democratic idea of autonomous political organization, later federated in the American Union, whose American standard was first raised on the banks of the James River in old Virginia, still flies its flag high in all the Western World. The freedom and security of the right of all human beings to organize in churches, legislatures, corporations, and labor unions is part of the basic meaning of our American freedom and is at the heart of what the war is all about. Hitler is out to destroy the freedom of America and the free basic institutions of democracy everywhere. The struggle over the freedom and security of the union is, therefore, one of the latest episodes in the American chapter of the rise of democracy in the modern world, and is at the very center of the global struggle between the United Nations and the Axis Powers.

THE PRESENT CRISIS

Today the power of the Axis tyranny reaches from the Alaskan islands to the outposts of Australia, across the Mediterranean and north Africa to the gates of Alexandria, from the top of Norway to the Bay of Biscay, and from the shores of France to the plains of Russia across the Don and in a mighty sweeping movement toward the Volga. In mankind's darkest hour, still holds the heroism of the Russian, British, and Chinese peoples counting not the cost even unto death of millions of their best and bravest sons, giving their all that the free institutions of the people shall not perish from the earth. One of the youngest of these free institutions would, by this decision, be made more secure for the all-out effort to win the war. By provision for the freedom and security of this union, the empire of steel becomes potentially the commonwealth of steel. The commonwealth of steel becomes even more a basic resource of the American Commonwealth in the production of ships, planes, tanks, and guns for the mighty forward fronts of democracy which will beat back the Axis powers and make possible at last the advance of freedom and the organization of justice and peace in the world.

Opinion by:

FRANK P. GRAHAM.

Mr. President, to those words of the great Frank Graham, in honor of the great free labor movement in the United States, I say "amen."

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou gracious benefactor, who hast blessed us with the gift of a new day, may all of its hours be radiant and vibrant with that which is noble and beautiful.

Grant that this Labor Day may kindle within us a longing to have a larger part in building a social order in which bruised and burdened humanity shall find and enjoy the blessings of peace and prosperity, of health and happiness.

Inspire us to give life a more sacred and valiant reading by interpreting and manifesting its high and holy meaning and mission in terms of service for Thee, our beloved country, and all mankind.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8678. An act to amend the Federal Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 to make certain adjustments in the Federal-aid highway program, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists on its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. KERR, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. MARTIN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ROCKEFELLER—LIFE MEMBER OF NAACP

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, those who may have been wondering whether or not the Governor of New York, Nelson Rockefeller, would be a candidate for President of the United States may relax. His decision has been announced, by act if not by words.

The basic requirement for national office north of the Mason-Dixon line is membership in the NAACP. Governor Rockefeller has not only qualified for membership in that dubious organization but he has qualified for and accepted life membership in the NAACP.

Political success and support of the NAACP go hand and hand in New York. They are as close as Damon and Pythias. So it was to be expected that when Rockefeller was running for Governor that a great point was made about the substantial contributions of the Rockefeller family to the NAACP. On the basis of the results it is obvious that this support earned Rockefeller admission to New York's political hall of fame.

Having established peace, at least political peace, with the NAACP, a new and horrible specter has raised its head in New York. To the shock of the entire civilized world we discovered that robbery, murder, rape, felonious assault, and narcotics violations are rampant. They seem to be beyond the control of lawful authorities. So I wonder if the reestablishment of law and order in New York is as dependent upon the Governor's colleagues in the NAACP as was his temporary political success.

DISCHARGE PETITION ON CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the discharge petition concerning the civil rights bill is now on the Speaker's desk for signature. I hope as many as possible will sign the petition as expeditiously as possible.

DISCHARGE PETITION ON CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am not happy at being here on Labor Day, but I am going to take advantage of being here to sign the discharge petition for the civil rights bill. On Labor Day we rededicate ourselves to the mission of maintaining the dignity of man by giving recognition to the men and women in the great labor forces of our country as equal participants in our national effort for a democracy of justice and equality in which all men of good hearts and good deeds are equally mentioned. In the spirit of this day we can make amends for our being here by signing a petition aimed at giving the blessing of dignity to our fellow Americans now denied it. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this House will not even consider the matter of adjournment until a strong civil rights bill has been passed.

HIGH INTEREST ON GOVERNMENT BONDS IS INFLATIONARY AND IS DRYING UP LOAN MONEY

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the policy of making Government bonds speculative high interest securities rather than nonspeculative low interest securities is now causing a shortage of loan money for farmers and further threatening the farm problem. Many banks are not now willing to make many farm and personal loans. Some banks are holding Government bonds that would have to be sold at a loss in order to get the money to make the loans. The banks that have cash want to buy the high interest bearing Government bonds rather than take the trouble to make a series of loans.

Failure to support the bond market and making Government bonds speculative has left banks in a position of gambling with depositors' money almost as much as if they were buying common stock. For this reason, many normal customers for Government bonds have jumped into the stock market and driven it up to a dangerous level. Banks' obligations to their customers are in terms of dollars rather than purchasing value, and it would be in both their interest and the interest of the Government for them to purchase lower interest, nonspeculative securities. It now develops that the departure from marketing and supporting this type of Government bond is drying up the money available for farm and small loans. Higher and higher interest rates on Government bonds help only a few who don't need help and unless this high interest policy of the administration is stopped, we are bound to have another inflationary spiral of higher interest rates with even less money available to loan to individuals.

KHRUSHCHEV SHOULD NOT COME TO THE UNITED STATES SO LONG AS COMMUNIST AGGRESSION CONTINUES IN LAOS

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a House concurrent resolution calling on the President of the United States to withdraw the invitation to Soviet Premier Khrushchev to visit the United States unless and until all Communist action in Laos has come to a complete stop.

Like many Members of this body I was originally willing to go along with Vice President NIXON's recommendation in favor of this visit.

But, Mr. Speaker, in view of the drastic changes in world conditions that have taken place since Mr. Eisenhower originally invited the Communist dictator to this exchange of visits, I now believe it would be a major diplomatic disaster for us to go ahead with it as originally scheduled.

The United States today is proceeding in the United Nations to take action with regard to the aggression in Laos. Over the weekend, in fact, the State Department has directly accused the Communists of duplicity in fomenting the aggression in Laos, and it seems to me we certainly should not receive the dictator of the Soviet Union on a red carpet at Andrews Field at the same time such action is being taken by the United States. To go ahead with the Khrushchev visit under such conditions would be to negotiate with a gun at our heads and converse with a switchblade knife at our throats.

I hope my resolution will be speedily adopted, and that the invitation will be promptly withdrawn.

CIVIL RIGHTS-LABOR BILLS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, my very, very dear friend and colleague, formerly from the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan, and now Chicago, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA], was bemoaning the fact that we had not brought out a civil rights bill, and he hoped we would stay here until we did. I do not know why the gentleman wants a civil rights bill for it evidently would not apply to Congressmen. Members will remember, 4 or 5 days ago I was trying to get time to talk about a couple of amendments to the labor bill which many considered were not only desirable but necessary. I got 54 seconds on one and 54 on another, although Mr. Meany had recommended one of those amendments. Why the gag? Why the knockdown tactics? Why the hurry? Now, since that time we have spent at least 3 days, Mr. Speaker, fussing around here, trying to find something to do. Why could they not have let a Member discuss for at least 5 minutes—go on and exercise my right to be heard? Perhaps the talk would not have been valuable to anybody, but still it would have brought the issue fairly to the attention of the House and just possibly it might have been adopted.

It seems somewhat silly to ask for a recognition of civil rights when a Member is denied 5 minutes to discuss an amendment offered in good faith.

Rather inconsistent for a coalition which claims to be trying to obtain equal rights for union members in union meeting to deny the right of a Member to discuss an amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 341 and ask for its immediate consideration.

HANDBOOK ENTITLED "THE UNITED STATES COURTS"

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 352 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL COPIES, HEARINGS OF COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 354 and ask for its immediate consideration.

FOREIGN TRADE INTERESTS IN STATE OF OREGON

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 370 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the document entitled "Foreign Trade Interests in the State of Oregon" be printed as a House document.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain what this document is concerning foreign trade?

Mr. HAYS. This is a study made by the Library of Congress. It is similar to a study that was made on request of Members from Michigan concerning the State of Michigan. The one concerning Michigan has proved to be a valuable document and is in great demand. This is a similar study on the State of Oregon.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAYS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Is this a promotion of the so-called Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act?

Mr. HAYS. No, I would say it is not. It is an evaluation of the pros and cons of reciprocal trade in any given State and, as most documents done by the Library of Congress, all that I have seen, it is impartial and evaluates both sides of the issue.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROCEEDINGS HONORING MEMORY OF FATHER JUNIPERO SERRA, O.F.M.

With the following committee amendment:

On line 6, strike out the period and insert the following: "; and that five thousand additional copies shall be printed for distribution by the chairman of the Committee To Commemorate and Honor the Memory of Father Junipero Serra, O.F.M."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

COMMISSIONER FOR GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK, ARIZ.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1164) to authorize the appointment of a commissioner for Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask if there are commissioners in other national parks with similar status as this commissioner who would be installed in the Grand Canyon National Park in Arizona.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. The answer to that is yes.

Mr. GROSS. What would be the salary of this commissioner?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. The regular commissioner's salary.

Mr. GROSS. What is that salary?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. $2,100 up to $10,000, depending upon the classification of the particular commissioner.

Mr. GROSS. $2,100 up to $10,000?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSS. What is the proposed salary of this one?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. That is the range through which a U.S. commissioner may be paid. The district judge fixes the salary and it is subject to the approval of the Judicial Conference.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman have any idea of what this salary would be?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. I cannot tell you what the district judge in the State of Arizona may set up as the salary.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman have any idea what the total cost would be? There will be some secretarial and clerical help here, as well as office help and office equipment; and so on and so forth.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. Yes, I am happy to yield. I am looking for information.

Mr. CELLER. This procedure outlined in this bill concerning the setting up of National Park Commissioners is not unusual. This is a course we have always followed. The compensation paid to the Commissioner in this case is left to the district judge in the district where the Commissioner serves, subject however, to the approval of the Judicial Conference.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman says this is not unusual. Will the gentleman state where any other National Park Commissioner has been established?

Mr. CELLER. I cannot give you exactly the name of a park, but we have done this before. I would not say it has been done often, but we are confronted with this situation. The commissioners usually are too far distant from the scene of operations here and when there is any infraction of the law it would be much more convenient to have the infraction tried by the commissioner in the park itself, otherwise those who are accused of violation of the law would have to travel a great distance before a U.S. commissioner.

Mr. GROSS. I understand the purpose of this bill, but I still do not have an answer to my question.

I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I thank the gentleman for yielding. The situation is precisely as the gentlemen from New York and Colorado stated. This is a situation in which the situs of the park is so great and the distance from the nearest commissioner that the violations which might occur under the park rules and other matters within the park are not conveniently brought before any forum until the individual is taken to Phoenix which is a long distance away. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not see fit to object.

Mr. GROSS. Let me ask the gentleman a question which I have not yet receive an answer to. In what other national parks are commissioners established on the basis that this commissioner would be?

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I know, I will say to the gentleman, of no other national park and I know of no other situation similar to this.

Mr. GROSS. This, then, becomes a precedent, does it not?

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. ASPINALL. The Mesa Verde National Park in southwestern Colorado has a commissioner. He draws in the neighborhood of $4,000 a year and is appointed by the Federal district judge. The Rocky Mountain National Park, Estes Park, the Colorado National Monument, and the Grand Canyon National Monument at Grand Junction have commissioners.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. I think it is important to bear in mind the fact that after the compensation has been fixed it is more or less a guess as to the quantity of work. The compensation agreed to is referred to the Judicial Conference, and if it is unconscionable and out of all reason, then, of course, the conference instructs the judge to modify the order in which the compensation was fixed.

Mr. GROSS. I may say to the gentleman from New York and also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the thing about which I am concerned is whether this is going to be a precedent for the establishment of commissioners in other national parks of substantial size in the United States.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I would like to read to the gentleman from section 631 of title 28 of the United States Code under the title of U.S. Commissioner, the following:

One commissioner shall be appointed for each of the following-named national parks: Lassen, Big Bend, Crator Lake, Glacier, Hawaii, Isle Royale, Mesa Verde, Mammoth Cave, Mount Rainier, Olympic, Rocky Mountain, Sequoia, Shenandoah, Yellowstone, and Yosemite.

Mr. GROSS. I point out to the gentleman that in the committee report on this bill no mention is made of any commissioner being appointed in any other park so far as I was able to see.

Mr. CELLER. We did not anticipate that question would arise. I am glad the question was asked because the answer can now be given.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. CHELF. Let me say to the gentleman that I have personal knowledge of only one place where there is a U.S. commissioner and that is Mammoth Cave National Park in Kentucky, most of which is located in the district of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. NATCHER], but the entrance to which is located in my Fourth Congressional District, and covers approximately 4,000 acres of the 50,000 total acres.

This position was held for quite some time by a very, very dear friend of mine, Judge William Yancey Handy, and at the time of his death our Federal judge at Louisville, the Honorable Roy Shelburne, appointed as his successor a fine young man from Glasgow, Ky., in my district, U. O. Barrickman, who is now serving.

I think the salary is somewhere in the neighborhood of $3,000 to $3,600 a year. Of course, an income of that size is insufficient, but combined with his practice of law he is able to make a go of it. He is a splendid young lawyer and doing an excellent job.

I am trying to shoot square with the gentleman and to lay the cards face up on the barrel top just like I know my friend wants me to do. A good, energetic, conscientious, capable, fair commissioner at any national park can really protect it. One is needed like a city judge is necessary for the local police court.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States District Court for the District of Arizona shall appoint a special commissioner for the Grand Canyon National Park, Arizona. The commissioner shall hold office for four years, unless sooner removed by the district court, and he shall be subject to the general laws and requirements applicable to United States commissioners.

SEC. 2. The jurisdiction of the commissioner in adjudicating cases brought before him shall be limited to the trial, and sentencing upon conviction, of persons charged with the commission of those misdemeanors classified as petty offenses (18 U.S.C. 1) relating to the violation of Federal laws or regulations applicable within the park: Provided, That any person charged with a petty offense may elect to be tried in the district court of the United States; and the commissioner shall apprise the defendant, of his right to make such election, but shall not proceed to try the case unless the defendant, after being so apprised, signs a written consent to be tried before the commissioner. The exercise of additional functions by the commissioner shall be consistent with and be carried out in accordance with the authority, laws, and regulations of general application to United States commissioners. The rules of procedure set forth in title 18, section 3402, of the United States Code shall be followed in the handling of cases by such commissioner. The probation laws shall be applicable to persons tried by the commissioner and he shall have power to grant probation.

SEC. 3 The commissioner shall receive an annual salary to be fixed by the district court with the approval of the Judicial Conference of the United States and shall account for all fees, fines, and costs collected by him as public moneys. He shall reside within the boundary of the park or at some place reasonably adjacent thereto designated by the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the district court.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXAMINATION OF ATTORNEYS' FEES

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 8708) to amend subdivision d of section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U.S.C. 96d) so as to give the court authority on its own motion to reexamine attorney fees paid or to be paid in a bankruptcy preceeding.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of American in Congress assembled, That subdivision d of section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U.S.C. 96d) is amended to read as follows:

"d. If a debtor shall, directly or indirectly, in contemplation of the filing of a petition by or against him, pay money or transfer property to an attorney at law, for services rendered or to be rendered, the transaction may be examined by the court on its own motion or shall be examined by the court on petition of the trustee or any creditor and shall be held valid only to the extent of a reasonable amount to be determined by the court, and the excess may be recovered by the trustee for the benefit of the estate.

"If, whether before or after filing, a debtor shall agree orally or in writing to pay money or transfer property to an attorney at law after the filing, the transaction may be examined by the court on its own motion or shall be examined by the court on petition of the bankrupt made prior to discharge and shall be held valid only to the extent of a reasonable amount to be determined by the court, and any excess obligation shall be canceled, or if excess payment or transfer has been made, returned to the bankrupt."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MINERALS ON THE CROW INDIAN RESERVATION, MONTANA

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 6508) to grant minerals, including oil and gas, on certain lands in the Crow Indian Reservation, Montana, to certain Indians, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 6 of the Act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 751), as amended by the Act of May 26, 1926 (44 Stat. 658), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. "(b) Title to the minerals so granted shall be held by the United States in trust for the Indian owners, except that if upon the expiration of said fifty years, the entire Indian interest in the minerals within any allotment or parcel thereof is granted by this Act to a person or persons who at that time hold an unrestricted title to the lands overlying such minerals, then the Secretary of the Interior shall by fee patent transfer to such person or persons the unrestricted fee simple title to such minerals, which title shall vest in such person or persons as of the date of the patent."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The payment of such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of the State of Oklahoma against the United States by reason of an agreement made by the United States through the Works Projects Administration, under a stipulation filed on February 25, 1951, in the case of United States versus Phillips and others (civil action numbered 351 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Oklahoma), for the Works Projects Administration to participate in certain highway projects in the Grand River Dam Reservoir area undertaken by the State Highway Commission of the State of Oklahoma and necessitated by reason of the construction of the Grand River Dam. STATION OF RETIRED JUDGES ASSIGNED TO ACTIVE DUTY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 2982) to fix the official station of retired judges assigned to active duty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this would provide for paying the expenses of a retired judge assigned to active duty from the place of domicile rather than from the judicial station. Is that correct?

Mr. CELLER. Yes. I might give the gentleman an illustration so he may better understand the purpose of the bill. Let us say we have a retired New York judge who has gone to Florida where he wants to pass the rest of his life. He is then called back to active duty in Chicago. Under present law he cannot receive any travel allowance beyond that which he would receive in going from New York to Chicago, rather than his present abode, Florida, to Chicago. It is to obviate that injustice that this bill was suggested.

Mr. GROSS. My concern is that on the adoption of this bill we will be paying the transportation costs of judges from California to New York when there are judges in intervening territory; in other words, pile up traveling expenses in the assignment of judges. I would like to have the assurance of the gentleman that it is not the intent of this legislation to move judges back and forth across the continent simply because their expenses are being paid, moving them from California to New York or New York to California for instance, when there are retired judges in between who are available at less expense.

Mr. CELLER. I do not think the gentleman need have any fears about that. We have been assured by members of the Judicial Conference and by the Administrator of the U.S. Courts and many of the chief judges of the court of appeals that will not be the case. They try to get judges as near as possible to the courts where the calendars are congested and they do not go too far unless they have to.

Mr. GROSS. I understand the purpose of the bill, but I think there should have been some restrictive language in the bill or in the report, if not in the bill; stating that judges would not be moved from the Canadian border to Florida, from New York to California or vice versa, with judges available in between. I just do not want to see that sort of thing happen. I am not going to object to the bill, but I hope the gentleman's committee will take a second look at this, once the bill goes into effect, and ascertain whether the bill is being abused in that respect.

Mr. CELLER. We will be glad to consider the gentleman's view.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. WALTER). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 374 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 374. Residence of retired judges; official station

"Retired judges of the United States are not subject to restrictions as to residence. The place where a retired judge maintains the actual abode in which he customarily lives shall be deemed to be his official station for the purposes of section 456 of the title."

SEC. 2. Item 374 in the analysis of chapter 17 of title 28 of the United States Code, immediately preceding section 371 of such title, is amended to read as follows:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENDING THE VALIDITY OF THE PASSPORT TO 3 YEARS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1973) to extend the validity of the passport to 3 years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is not the bill that is on the list of suspensions for today?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate the issue and validity of passports, and for other purposes", approved July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 887), is amended (1) by striking out "of two years" and inserting in lieu thereof "of three years", and (2) by striking out "four years" and inserting in lieu thereof "five years".

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CUTTING OF HAY FROM SOIL BANK LAND

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 8578) to amend the Soil Bank Act so as to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to permit the harvesting of hay on conservation reserve acreage under certain conditions.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 107(a)(3) of the Soil Bank Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and except that the Secretary may authorize the county agricultural stabilization committees to sell hay on such acreage, with the consent of the producer, to the highest bidder, and return the proceeds thereof to the United States Treasury, less such amounts as the committees deem adequate to compensate the producer for damage, if any, to his premises, if after certification by the Governor of the State in which such acreage is situated of the need therefor, the Secretary determines that it is necessary to permit such sale in order to alleviate damage, hardship, or suffering caused by severe drought, flood, or other natural disaster".

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHANGING THE NAME OF ROOSEVELT DAM, RESERVOIR, AND POWER PLANT IN ARIZONA TO THEODORE ROOSEVELT DAM, LAKE, AND POWER PLANT

The Clerk called Senate Joint Resolution 25, to change the name of Roosevelt Dam, Reservoir, and Power Plant in Arizona to Theodore Roosevelt Dam, Lake, and Power Plant.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the dam, reservoir, and power plant in Arizona, known as Roosevelt Dam, Reservoir, and Power Plant, shall hereafter be known as Theodore Roosevelt Dam, Lake, and Power Plant, and any law, regulation, document, or record of the United States in which such dam, reservoir and power plant are designated or referred to under the name of Roosevelt Dam, Reservoir, and Power Plant shall be held to refer to such dam, reservoir, and power plant and by the name of Theodore Roosevelt Dam, Lake, and Power Plant.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROMOTING PEACE THROUGH THE REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

The Clerk called House Concurrent Resolution 393.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House concurrent resolution?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the necessity for this legislation. I should like particularly to have some explanation of the language on page 2 of the bill reading "to devote a substantial portion of any resultant savings to expand its works of peace throughout the world."

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman is fully familiar with the report accompanying this House concurrent resolution. The purpose of the resolution is very clear. It is to encourage and to reassure the nations of the world of the reaffirmation by the Congress of the U.S. policy toward disarmament and to assist undeveloped countries in the years to come. As the gentleman knows, Communist propaganda reiterates to the people of the world that U.S. assistance to other nations is related only to our cold war effort. This resolution states it is the intent of the United States to divert a portion of the money not used for armament for the improvement of undeveloped countries.

Mr. GROSS. Let me ask the gentleman this question. Why do we have to reaffirm our position in this matter of disarmament and peace to any nation in the world? What makes this sort of a resolution necessary?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Well, I am sure the gentleman is fully aware of the fact that Communist propaganda is exploiting developments in certain parts of the underdeveloped areas of the world. Therefore, I am sure the gentleman will agree with me that it is necessary to reiterate our position.

Mr. GROSS. Is there any question on the part of anyone, outside of the Iron Curtain countries, perhaps, about where we stand on disarmament and peace? I just cannot understand what this resolution is designed to do.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I agree with the gentleman that there should not be any doubt. But, if there is one iota of evidence that there is some doubt, I think that the passage of the resolution is warranted. It is in keeping with our international policy.

Mr. GROSS. Now, let us get down to the language on page 2. The resolution reaffirms our position in behalf of disarmament and then states that it is the policy of Congress "to devote a substantial portion of any resultant savings to expand its work of peace throughout the world." What do you mean by that? If we cut off several billion dollars in providing weapons, are we going to turn around and spend that on some more foreign boondoggles as we are today?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. It does not mean that at all.

Mr. GROSS. Then, what does it mean?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Let us say there is a saving of $10 billion as the result of this disarmament program. A substantial amount—could be interpreted to be $1 billion, half a billion, or $200 million; in my opinion a million is a substantial amount. The point is we are reiterating that should there be any savings as a result of disarmament, it is our intent to whatever extent practicable or reasonable, to divert such savings to better the economies of the underdeveloped areas of the world.

Mr. GROSS. How do you propose to do that, add to all of the boondoggles that are now being carried on? Where and how do you propose to spend the money? Are you just dealing in euphemy here? Again, what does that mean?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I do not think we are dealing with euphemy. I think it is very necessary. I might point out that any savings due to demilitarization or less expenditure on military projects could very well be diverted to continue the agricultural surplus program.

Mr. GROSS. Let me ask the gentleman in all fairness and in all candor this question. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin think that if we can make any saving as a result of disarmament, that we ought to apply that to retirement of the $290 billion Federal debt instead of adding it to the load that is already being poured out all over the world? Why this language? Do you want to come back to the Congress on another day and say, "Oh, you voted for the resolution that established this policy." You hear that almost every day.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The gentleman knows that this or any Congress cannot bind any future Congress. Because of the psychological impact I believe it is very vital and necessary that Congress reiterate our desire for peace.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this measure is of such far-reaching importance that it should be fully discussed under the rules of the House, and I object to its consideration.

CHANGING THE DATE OF CHILD HEALTH DAY

The Clerk called the resolution (H.J. Res. 317) to change the designation of Child Health Day from May 1 to the first Monday in October of each year.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this mean that we have so many days set off under the law that no one can keep track of them and so they conflict with each other? Is that not about the situation in connection with this resolution?

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, what it means is this: In 1928 this Congress—a long time before I was here——

Mr. GROSS. And before I was here, too.

Mr. FORRESTER. Passed a Child Health Day. A few years ago this Congress set up a Loyalty Day, one which was very needful and designed for the express purpose of furnishing some opposition to the Communists in the State of New York on May Day. So, they passed that last bill, and you have two bills for the same day now.

Mr. GROSS. Well, that is what I say. We are getting so many of these days that nobody seems to be able to keep track of them. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, effective January 1, 1960, the Act of May 18, 1928 (36 U.S.C. 143), is amended by striking out "May 1" and inserting in lieu thereof "the first Monday in October".

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELATING TO FALSE FINANCIAL STATEMENTS IN BANKRUPTCY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4346) to amend the Bankruptcy Act to limit the use of false financial statements as a bar to discharge.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 14c(3) of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U.S.C. 32(c)(3)), is amended to read as follows:

"(3) while engaged in business as a sole proprietor, partnership, or as an executive of a corporation, obtained for such business money or property on credit or as an extension or renewal of credit by making or publishing or causing to be made or published in any manner whatsoever a materially false statement in writing respecting his financial condition or the financial condition of such partnership or corporation; or"

SEC. 2. Subdivision a. of section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U.S.C. 35a), is amended to read as follows:

obtaining money or property by false pretenses or false representations, or for obtaining money or property on credit or obtaining an extension or renewal of credit in reliance upon a materially false statement in writing respecting his financial condition made or published or caused to be made or published in any manner whatsoever with intent to defraud, or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, or for alimony due or to become due, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for breach of promise of marriage accompanied by seduction, or for criminal conversation; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity; or (5) are for wages which have been earned within three months before the date of commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy due to workmen, servants, clerks, or traveling or city salesmen, on salary or commission basis, whole or part time, whether or not selling exclusively for the bankrupt; or (6) are due for moneys of an employee received or retained by his employer to secure the faithful performance by such employee of the terms of a contract of employment."

Committee amendments: On page 2, line 16, strike out "defraud" and substitute "deceive".

On page 2, line 25, strike out "or".

On page 3, line 2, strike out "or" where it appears before (5).

TOLL BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE NEAR LOS INDIOS, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 8582) to authorize the San Benito International Bridge Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Rio Grande near Los Indios, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I take this time to compliment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] on the fact that private enterprise is building the toll bridge across this stream in Texas. I simply want to compliment the gentleman from Texas on the fact you are doing it by private enterprise and not saddling the cost of this bridge upon all of the taxpayers as Congress has done in building bridges over the Potomac River between the States of Maryland and Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the San Benito International Bridge Company of San Benito, Texas, is authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Rio Grande at or near Los Indios, Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906 (33 U.S.C., secs. 491 to 498, inclusive), subject to—

(1) the conditions and limitations contained in this Act;

(2) the approval of the International Boundary and Water Commission, United States and Mexico; and

(3) the approval of the proper authorities in the Republic of Mexico; with respect to the construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge.

SEC. 2. The San Benito International Bridge Company may fix and charge tolls for transit over the bridge referred to in the first section of this Act in accordance with the laws of the State of Texas, and the laws of the United States, applicable to such tolls, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed under the authority contained in section 4 of the Act of March 23 (33 U.S.C., sec. 494).

SEC. 3. The San Benito International Bridge Company may sell, assign, transfer, or mortgage the rights, powers, and privileges conferred on such Company by this Act to any public agency, or to an international bridge authority or commission, and any such agency, authority, or commission is authorized to exercise the rights, powers, and privileges acquired under this section (including acquisition by mortgage foreclosure) in the same manner as if such rights, powers, and privileges had been granted by this Act directly to such agency, authority, or commission.

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of the Act of March 23, 1906 (33 U.S.C., sec. 496), this Act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge referred to in the first section of this Act is commenced within three years and completed within five years from the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TOLL BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE, AT OR NEAR RIO GRANDE CITY, TEX.

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 8694) to authorize the Starr-Camargo Bridge Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Rio Grande, at or near Rio Grande City, Tex.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to facilitate international commerce, improve the postal service, and other purposes, the Starr-Camargo Bridge Company of the State of Texas is authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Rio Grande, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Rio Grande City, Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this Act, and subject further to the approval of the International Boundary and Water Commission, United States and Mexico, and also subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Republic of Mexico to the construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge.

SEC. 2. The Starr-Camargo Bridge Company is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with any laws of the State of Texas or the United States applicable thereto, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed under the authority contained in the Act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 3. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this Act to any public agency, or to an international bridge authority or commission, is hereby granted to the Starr-Camargo Bridge Company; and any such public agency, international bridge authority, or international bridge commission to which such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or which shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such public agency, international bridge authority, or international bridge commission.

AUTHORIZING THE PRESIDENT TO INVITE FOREIGN COUNTRIES TO PARTICIPATE IN A WORLD'S FAIR, NEW YORK, 1964

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 496.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this House joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

REVISING ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS FOR BURIAL IN NATIONAL CEMETERIES

The Clerk called the bill (S. 825) to revise eligibility requirements for burial in national cemeteries, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to ask a clarifying question. The bill states that any member or former member of the armed services is eligible to be buried in a national cemetery. Does that include members and former members of the Reserve components?

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, such members at the present time have these rights, but this legislation is for the purpose of seeing to it that those forces to which the gentleman has made reference will be entitled to this privilege even when they are going to an assignment or coming back from an assignment.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I thank the gentleman. My interest stems from the fact that a number of years ago a most distinguished son of Illinois, who served under military orders and as part of the Armed Forces in Cuba and in Puerto Rico with outstanding courage and brilliancy, but technically as a member of the National Guard, I think, from the State of Washington, was denied burial in a national cemetery.

Mr. ASPINALL. That would be possible under certain circumstances, and it would even with this legislation.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Then, what am I to understand as the meaning of the words "armed services?" Does that include the National Guard?

Mr. ASPINALL. It includes the National Guard when the National Guard is serving as a component of the Armed Forces of the United States, as I understand, during training activities or during wartime.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I do not know that I quite understand the reply. Now, in the Spanish-American War I was in a National Guard regiment that was federalized. I am entitled under the present law to burial in Arlington. But the distinguished son of Illinois of whom I have spoken likewise was a member of a National Guard regiment on active duty. Now, how could burial in Arlington be denied him?

Mr. ASPINALL. I do not know. I will have to say to my colleague from Illinois that I do not have the answer to that.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Then, I trust that in the next session, if such a case is not covered, that we can again amend this act to see that such an injustice does not occur again. I should explain that the gentleman to whom I have referred at the time was a Member of Congress and the law then was that a Member of Congress entering the armed services had to resign from Congress. This enforced retirement from Congress did not hold when the service was with the National Guard. I hope the committee will recommend remedial legislation, if needed, at the next session. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I would like to address a question to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ASPINALL]. Do I understand this greatly expands the number of persons who can be interred in the various national cemeteries?

Mr. ASPINALL. I believe the gentleman is wrong in using the word "greatly." This expands it to take care of a few. There are only a very few individuals, as I understand, who are now denied the privilege but who would come in under the terms of this legislation.

Mr. GROSS. Under present law can minor children be buried in national cemeteries?

Mr. ASPINALL. Yes.

Mr. GROSS. Under present law can adult children be buried in national cemeteries?

Mr. ASPINALL. Under certain circumstances.

Mr. GROSS. Is it discretionary?

Mr. ASPINALL. That is right. Members of the National Guard and Reserve components who have been serving alongside of the other branches of the military.

Mr. GROSS. Well, it is my opinion that this bill greatly expands the number of persons being buried in national cemeteries.

Mr. ASPINALL. I do not think so, over what it is at the present time.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion, and only time, through the test of this legislation, will prove which of us may be right. But, I should like to say that in view of the opinion I hold that it will bring additional burials in these national cemeteries, I think this is an excellent time to abandon all future talk of constructing that monstrosity known as the Freedom Wall adjacent to Arlington Cemetery. It seems to me that Arlington Cemetery, as one of the national cemeteries, will use every acre of ground that they can get hold of in the forseeable future to take care of those burials without the land being used for other purposes.

Mr. ASPINALL. On page 2 of the report it states:

It has been estimated that not more than 25 burials per year wold be requested under the circumstances covered by the measure.

May I say also that the plot of ground to which my colleague refers, the Nevius tract, will only take care of about 25 burials.

Mr. GROSS. Well, that would be of some help.

Mr. ASPINALL. That will be of some help.

Mr. GROSS. I hope the gentleman's committee will abandon any further consideration of the so-called Freedom Wall.

I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act of May 14, 1948 (ch. 289, 62 Stat. 234), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense, prescribe, the remains of the following persons may be buried in national cemeteries:

"(1) Any member or former member of the Armed Forces who served on active duty (other than for training) and whose last such service terminated honorably.

"(2) Any member of a reserve component of the Armed Forces, and any member of the Army National Guard or the Air National Guard, whose death occurs under honorable conditions while he is—

"(A) on active duty for training, or performing full-time service under section 316, 503, 504, or 505 of title 32, United States Code;

"(B) performing authorized travel to or from that duty or service;

"(C) on authorized inactive duty training, including training performed as a member of the Army National Guard or the Air National Guard; or

"(D) hospitalized or undergoing treatment, at the expense of the United States, for injury or disease contracted or incurred under honorable conditions while he is—

"(i) on that duty or service;

"(ii) performing that travel or inactive duty training; or

"(iii) undergoing that hospitalization or treatment at the expense of the United States.

"(3) Any member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps of the Army, Navy, or Air Force whose death occurs under honorable conditions while he is—

"(A) attending an authorized training camp or on an authorized practice cruise;

"(B) performing authorized travel to or from that camp or cruise; or

"(C) hospitalized or undergoing treatment, at the expense of the United States, for injury or disease contracted or incurred under honorable conditions while he is—

"(i) attending that camp or on that cruise;

"(ii) performing that travel; or

"(iii) undergoing that hospitalization or treatment at the expense of the United States.

"(4) Any citizen of the United States who, during any war in which the United States is or has been engaged, served in the armed forces of any government allied with the United States during that war, and whose last such service terminated honorably.

"(5) The wife, husband, surviving spouse, minor child, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Army, unmarried adult child of any of the persons listed in clauses (1)–(4).

"(b) The remains of any person listed in subsection (a)(5) may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Army, be removed from a national cemetery proper and interred in the post section of a national cemetery or in a post cemetery if, upon death, the related person named in subsection (a)(1)–(4) is not buried in the same or an adjoining gravesite. However, the remains of a person listed in subsection (a)(5) may not be removed from a national cemetery proper if the related person is—

"(1) lost or buried at sea;

"(2) officially determined to be permanently absent in a status of missing or missing in action;

"(3) officially determined to be dead for the purpose of terminating his status of missing or missing in action; or

"(4) one whose remains have not been recovered."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRESENT A STATUE OF GEN. GEORGE WASHINGTON TO URUGUAY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 8911) to provide for the presentation by the United States of a statue of Gen. George Washington to the people of Uruguay, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State is authorized and requested to procure a bronze statue of General George Washington and present the same, on behalf of the people of the United States, to the people of Uruguay as an expression of appreciation for the gift by the people of Uruguay of a bronze statue of General José Gervasio Artigas to the United States. Such statue shall be prepared only after the design, plans, and specifications therefor have been submitted to and approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts.

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, including payment of the cost of such statue, the design and construction of a suitable pedestal therefor, transportation, including insurance; and traveling expenses of persons delegated by the Secretary of State to present such statue, on behalf of the people of the United States, to the people of Uruguay.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTER-AMERICAN CHILDREN'S INSTITUTE

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 511) to amend the joint resolution providing for membership and participation by the United States in the inter-American Children's Institute, formerly known as the American International Institute for the Protection of Childhood, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman for some information concerning this resolution. I think Members of the House will be interested. Can the gentleman give us an explanation of what is proposed here?

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution increases from $25,000 to $50,000 the authorization for fiscal years 1961 and 1962 of the amount that may be appropriated to meet the annual contributions of the United States to the regular budget of the Inter-American Children's Institute.

This organization was established in 1928 and is composed of one representative from each of the 21 American republics. The Institute is a center for study, information, documentation, technical consultation, and advisory services on all questions concerning child life and child welfare in the Americas. The U.S. share of the total annual assessment is 40 percent.

The State Department in its request to the Committee on Foreign Affairs proposed an unlimited authorization for this program. The committee felt that the activities of the Institute required further study and a 2-year authorization of $50,000 annually was recommended.

Mr. GROSS. And that in spite of the fact that the U.S. delegate voted against the increase, did he not?

Mr. SELDEN. That is correct, but we are only one of 21 members of that organization. Unless this authorization is increased, we cannot meet our obligations to it.

Mr. GROSS. This started out with a contribution of $2,000 a year, did it not?

Mr. SELDEN. In 1928 our assessment was $2,000.

Mr. GROSS. And then in 1950 it went up to $10,000 annually, and it was increased in 1956 to $25,000 annually. This is growing and growing and growing, is it not?

Mr. SELDEN. Admittedly it has grown over a period of 30 years. The committee has limited the authorization request to $50,000 annually for 2 years so that our commitments to this organization can be met. It is the purpose of the committee to go into this matter very carefully during the next session of the Congress.

Mr. GROSS. It is stated here that we have certain obligations, that "in order to meet the obligations of the United States as a member of the Inter-American Children's Institute," and so forth. The bill recognizes our so-called obligations. But what about these other countries? According to the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of State, the other member countries owe $65,000 to this fund, do they not?

Mr. SELDEN. There are member nations who are in arrears. It is my understanding that the United States is in arrears at the present time and unless this authorization can be increased we will continue to be in arrears.

Mr. GROSS. Does not the gentleman think that Argentina could take up the slack for $15,000 that they owe this fund?

Mr. SELDEN. I certainly do. I would be in favor of all members paying what they owe.

Mr. GROSS. Is Brazil so bankrupt that it cannot pay their arrears of $16,000? Is Mexico so bankrupt that it cannot put up its $12,150 that it owes, according to the report to the Appropriations Subcommittee this year?

Mr. SELDEN. Perhaps they are trying to take the same action we are now trying to take—to increase their authorization so that they can meet their obligations under this program.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I am getting completely fed up with this business of a meeting being held in New Delhi, India, or Buenos Aires, or Warsaw, Poland, or Bonn, Germany, or Paris, or anywhere else in the world, where a bunch of foreigners sit down in some international organization and increase assessments on the United States when they themselves owe money to almost every one of these organizations. Yes, with the greatest of ease they meet somewhere, anywhere in the world, and increase the assessment and the load on the United States and our taxpayers. I am getting sick and tired of it.

Mr. SELDEN. The fact remains that we are a member of this group and, if we are going to stay in it, we should provide the funds necessary to meet our commitments. Otherwise, we should withdraw from the organization.

Mr. GROSS. And they are also members of this group. Surely, this is not a large amount of money, but there is a principle involved in this that interests me. The reason I am speaking as I do is because this is not the only agency that is doing this. Every one of these international agencies increases the assessments and when we protest it does not make any difference. Up go the assessments and we have to pay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

FACILITIES FOR THE GORGAS MEMORIAL LABORATORY

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2219) to authorize appropriations for construction of facilities for the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, to increase the authorization of appropriations for the support thereof, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, effective for fiscal years ending after June 30, 1960, section 1 of the Act of May 7, 1928 (22 U.S.C. 278), relating to the authorization of annual appropriations for maintenance and operation of the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, is amended by striking out "$150,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$250,000".

SEC. 2. Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 4. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as the Congress may find necessary for construction and equipment of facilities for the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, including preparation of plans and specifications, acquisition, alteration, expansion, and remodeling of buildings, and site improvements; but excluding the cost of the acquisition of land."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 3, after "appropriated" add "not to exceed $250,000"; and on page 2, lines 4 and 5 strike out "from time to time such sums as the Congress may find necessary".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. It was my pleasure on June 29, 1959, to introduce H.R. 8016, which is identical to S. 2219, sponsored by Senator HILL and approved by the Senate.

This legislation authorizes appropriations for certain purposes at the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory in Panama.

Two motivations brought me to sponsor legislation in this regard.

First, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I am particularly interested in all matters pertaining to health, and I am keenly aware of the great contribution that is being made in this field by the Gorgas Laboratory.

Secondly, as an Alabamian, I feel a very close affinity for the work which was begun a half century ago by another Alabamian, the illustrious William Crawford Gorgas, and I strongly want this work to continue as it has by Gorgas Laboratory.

America, and the world for that matter, owes a great deal to General Gorgas His medical and sanitation techniques not only made possible the building of the Panama Canal with all this means to us today, but they also marked a significant advancement in the continuing battle of man against disease.

I think Members will be interested in some of the background of this man and his work.

William Crawford Gorgas, born in Mobile, Ala., served in the U.S. Army Medical Corps after graduating from medical college.

In 1901, in Cuba, Gorgas for the first time put into use medical and sanitation techniques which eradicated the dread epidemic disease yellow fever.

When the tropical disease which had infested the Isthmus of Panama for four centuries defeated all efforts to build a canal there, Gorgas was dispatched to make the area livable.

Using the techniques proven in Cuba, Gorgas exterminated the disease-carrying mosquitoes and the canal was built.

Shortly after Gorgas died in 1920, the Gorgas Memorial Institute of Tropical and Preventive Medicine was founded. Its purposes were to conduct and encourage research in preventing and treating disease, particularly as applied to tropical disease.

In 1928, Congress authorized an annual contribution for maintenance and operation of the Panama Laboratory, in the amount of $50,000.

Following the U.S. lead, the Government of Panama ceded to Gorgas Memorial Institute a parcel of land and a building which through the years has increased in value and is now worth an estimated $225,000. It is near the heart of downtown Panama.

In 1948, Congress raised the annual appropriation to $150,000.

The legislation now under consideration asks for an annual $250,000 appropriation and for funds for enlarging the physical plant of the Laboratory.

The work of the Gorgas Laboratory has continually expanded, and its importance in the field of tropical disease has been steadily magnified.

The Laboratory has been at the forefront of the fight against yellow fever, and has been particularly effective since the new outbreak of that dreaded disease in 1948.

All of the armed services of this country utilize the Laboratory, and its research findings have proven invaluable to us.

During the past few years, the Laboratory has had a difficult time maintaining its operations, including professional personnel, on the appropriations it has received for the past 11 years.

In 1958 and 1959, for instance, the budget items for personal services alone exceeded the entire congressional appropriations for those years.

Under these circumstances, the Laboratory has had to rely very heavily upon research grant funds from other sources which it has been able to obtain from year to year.

Of course, this puts the work of this institution in an unstable and untenable position.

It is highly important, in view of the contributions made by our friends in Panama to this cause, that we not fall down in our share of the burden.

I understand that the Government of Panama has inquired of the authorities at Gorgas Institute about whether it plans to utilize the valuable property where the Laboratory is located.

The gift of the land was made with the stipulation that it be used by the Gorgas Memorial Institute for the purpose of conducting investigations in tropical and preventive medicine and that if such operation should be suspended for a period exceeding 5 years the property would revert to the Government of Panama.

The Institute needs and would like to expand its physical plant on this property, but has been unable to do so under its current appropriation.

There is a real danger, unless we utilize that property, that some of it may revert to Panama.

Under the appropriation we are now asking, the plant can be expanded and certain improvements made.

The annual increase will help maintain an adequate staff of competent research scientists and provide better administrative support.

I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection?

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, S. 2219 increases the authorization of annual appropriations for maintenance and operation of the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory from $150,000 to $250,000. It also authorizes an appropriation not to exceed $250,000 for the construction, alteration, and equipment of facilities for the Laboratory.

The Gorgas Memorial Institute of Tropical and Preventive Medicine was established in January 1929, by an act of Congress. The Institute sponsors the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, which is located in Panama City, Panama. The Gorgas Memorial Laboratory is the research center for investigation into the causes and prevention of tropical diseases, both human and animal. Both the Laboratory and the Institute are dedicated to the furthering of the cause of public health, primarily in tropical areas.

While the major mission of the Laboratory is in the field of medical research, it also performs valuable service functions. It is a reservoir of medical knowledge for visiting doctors and scientists from all over the world. We are all aware of the Laboratory's great contribution to our servicemen in World War II in combating malaria.

In 1948, yellow fever reappeared in Panama for the first time since 1905. In succeeding years, the yellow fever virus moved northward at a rapid pace. The studies made by the Laboratory disclosed the source of the viruses and the transmitting agents which prevented untold epidemics.

The need for an increase in annual appropriations is apparent. New viruses are being discovered which will require additional research medical scientists.

The physical facilities of the building are inadequate for expanded laboratory purposes. Not only are the premises inadequate, but they are not safe because the viruses can be easily transmitted to the laboratory workers. The original building was constructed for a medical school and not for a research laboratory. New equipment and modern medical facilities are required to help combat diseases that take so many human lives each year. These diseases can be eliminated and many lives saved.

The Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs heard several witnesses in support of this measure. At this point, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD the fine statement of Dr. Walter A. Bloedorn, president of the Gorgas Memorial Institute of Tropical and Preventive Medicine, Inc.:

STATEMENT OF WALTER A. BLOEDORN, M.D., PRESIDENT, GORGAS MEMORIAL INSTITUTE OF TROPICAL AND PREVENTIVE MEDICINE, INC., BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTER-AMERICAN AFFAIRS, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

I am Dr. Walter A. Bloedorn, formerly dean of the School of Medicine of George Washington University and medical director of the George Washington University Hospital. Since 1957 I have been president of the Gorgas Memorial Institute of Tropical and Preventive Medicine, and am appearing before you in that capacity.

S. 2219 and the House bill, H.R. 8016, which are identical bills, would (1) authorize an annual appropriation up to $250,000 for support of the Gorgas Memorial Institute, as compared with the present authorization of $150,000, and (2) authorize appropriations for construction and equipment of facilities.

The Gorgas Memorial Institute was named for a great general who made it possible to build the Panama Canal by the conquest of yellow fever and malaria. It was created in 1928 when legislation was passed permitting an annual authorization for the support of the Institute. In 1930, Panama ceded in perpetuity to the Gorgas Memorial Institute a parcel of land and a building constructed thereon originally intended to serve as a medical school. The plot of land comprises an entire city block which today is valued at over a quarter of a million dollars. The building was converted to a laboratory by the installation of utilities and equipment appropriate for research use. In its early years, there were only a few professional employees of the Laboratory so that the building itself could house animal quarters, insectaries, and laboratory space for visiting investigators.

During the last decade, increases in size of the professional staff were made possible by constructing a temporary building for the housing of laboratory animals and an insectary for rearing vectors and, unfortunately, by restricting the number of visiting scientists using the facilities.

ORGANIZATION

The Gorgas Memorial Institute is incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware and is governed by a Board of Directors which includes the Ambassador of Panama, the Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Public Health Service, presidents of selected professional organizations, and a group of elected directors. The Board of Directors meets annually and determines the policies of the Institute. The officers serve without compensation. The Gorgas Memorial Laboratory is the operating arm of the Institute and its entire staff is located in Panama. A Scientific Advisory Board assists in developing the research programs.

PERSONNEL

The Laboratory employs nine professional personnel, most of whom enjoy international scientific reputations. The Laboratory has been fortunate in the low turnover rate of its scientists which has provided a unique stability permitting long-term investigations. Until a few years ago, salaries were far below those of comparable research positions elsewhere with no provision for retirement. The Board of Directors at its annual meeting in 1954 approved a pay schedule more commensurate with that of comparable research workers in the United States and approved a contributory retirement plan. These actions are providing an even greater degree of stability than that of the past.

In my opinion, the staff is not only highly competent and well qualified, but has an eminence unexcelled anywhere in a small research laboratory. With such a staff, we can predict a continued output of highly significant research findings.

FINANCE

The major portion of the financial support of the Institute is appropriated by the Congress, but some funds are received from contracts with nongovernmental organizations (United Fruit Co.). Research funds available under the Gorgas authorization are augmented by research grants from the National Institutes of Health.

FUNCTIONS

The Laboratory was created to serve both the United States and Panama in research on those diseases which require a base of operations in a tropical area. The results are reported to the Congress annually. A perusal of these reports amply demonstrates the high quality of the work being performed. However, annual reporting may not give a proper perspective to the value and importance of the work. To illustrate, I will discuss research on two of the diseases—malaria and yellow fever—which have received the attention of the Laboratory.

Early work in the Laboratory consisted of evaluating a new German synthetic chemical—atabrine—against the malaria. Until 1930, quinine was the only available drug against this disease.

The Director of the Laboratory at that time, Dr. Herbert Clark, surveyed the malaria incidence among natives in Chagres River villages and then divided the villages into groups, treating some with quinine and some with atabrine. During the next decade, Dr. Clark obtained information on the value and limitations of atabrine as both a prophylactic and treatment agent against malaria.

This work took on an unanticipated importance in World War II, when U.S. imports of quinine were stopped and it became necessary to use another drug to supplement the diminishing supply of quinine to protect U.S. troops fighting in the South Pacific. During the early years of World War II, the United States therefore was forced to substitute atabrine for quinine, a substitution made possible by the investigations of Gorgas Memorial Laboratory.

In 1948, the yellow fever reappeared in Panama for the first time since 1905. In succeeding years, the yellow fever virus moved northward through the isthmus, up Central America, progressing at an average rate of 13 miles a month. This extension of yellow fever resulted from infections in monkeys transmitted by treetop mosquitoes with man as an incidental host. The Laboratory collected and identified mosquitoes transmitting the disease and studied their ecology. It also studied the mammalian hosts of the infection. These findings contributed greatly to the factual knowledge available today for prognosticating the movements of jungle yellow fever and for the scientific basis upon which it is hoped procedures can be developed. Much more needs to be done because there is epidemiological evidence that a mammal other than monkeys can serve as a reservoir of the virus, and mosquitoes presently not incriminated can transmit the disease, and because the mechanics of survival of the virus during climatically unfavorable periods are unknown.

While the major mission of the Laboratory is in the field of medical research, it also performs valuable service functions. It has, since its creation, been host to visiting medical scientists from the United States whose research endeavors carried them into the Tropics. Generally one, two, or even three such scientists are provided with Laboratory facilities for limited periods. The Laboratory also serves as a training station for U.S. physicians interested in tropical medicine who have traveling fellowships. Fellowships administered by the dean of LSU Medical School have included time spent in the Laboratory and on field trips under the direction of members of the regular staff. The Laboratory also serves as a diagnostic reference center for special examinations not otherwise available to the Panamanian authorities. Because of the competence of the staff, they are sometimes detailed to U.S. agencies for investigations of little known diseases. Such was the case when a senior staff member was loaned to the Army to investigate outbreaks of acute hemorrhagic fever in Korea.

RELATIONS WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF PANAMA

One of the most unique features of the Laboratory is the relations with other governments and agencies. It has been repeatedly reported that the Panamanian Government takes a great deal of pride in the work and accomplishments of the Laboratory. Through the Republic of Panama and its association with the Laboratory, personnel are given ready access to the countries of Central America, making it possible for them to follow their epidemiological investigations across national frontiers without the delays ordinarily experienced in international research.

RELATIONS WITH OTHER AGENCIES

The Laboratory collaborates very closely with the Pan American Health Organization which has need for expert talent and specialized laboratory facilities to carry on its control and eradication programs of Central America. Experts from both organizations frequently accompany one another on field expeditions, each contributing in his area of proficiency.

The new Middle America Research Unit of the National Institutes of Health, located in the Canal Zone, and the Gorgas Laboratory are carrying on cooperative studies made possible by the special resources available to each institution.

During 1958, Laboratory facilities were made available to research scientists from the U.S. National Museum, the University of Pennsylvania, Universidad Central de Venezuela, and the World Health Organization.

Consultant services are provided to various tropical industrial organizations, particularly the United Fruit Co.

The availability of NIH grants to the Laboratory makes it possible to carry on basic research on problems dealing with exotic diseases. The approval of such grants is subject to the same painstaking scrutiny as are other NIH grants but the number of grants that the Institute can request is limited by the physical facilities available and by the time that can be committed by the permanent staff. In this connection, I would like to point out that the funds available from Congress for development of medical research facilities in the United States under the Health Research Facilities Act are not available to the Gorgas Institute because of its geographic location outside the United States.

FUTURE OF THE INSTITUTE

It is obvious that with the increased rapidity and amount of international travel, the medical problems of Central America become more important to the United States. The new Pan American Highway provides a new artery for traffic between the United States and Panama but also provides a new channel for the transmission of tropical diseases. Every military emergency that this country has faced has shown us that we know too little of the diseases not ordinarily occurring in this country which in both World Wars and the Korean conflict led to unnecessary death and disability. These needs, along with the importance the Panamanians attach to this joint endeavor, point to the need for expansion of the Laboratory which can be expected to continue to pay dividends far beyond the amount invested. The joint endeavor of the United States and the Republic of Panama in medical research is an example of international cooperation of the highest quality.

With these considerations in mind, the Board of Directors of the Institute believe that the time has come when the annual operating authorization should be increased to $250,000 and when plans should be formulated for the expanding of physical plant to provide the space necessary for the Laboratory employees and for housing visiting investigators and fellows. The Board therefore hopes that you will give your full support to S. 2219.

Mr. Speaker, the funds requested in this authorization bill are required, and the beneficial results attained will serve the needs of mankind.

I urge the support of this measure.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CERTAIN LANDS FOR EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2390) to authorize the exchange of certain lands in or in the vicinity of Everglades City, Fla., in furtherance of the administration and use of the Everglades National Park.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in order to further the administration and use of the Everglades National Park, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States title to the following described parcels of land:

Those parts of tracts "R" and "S" which lie west of the right-of-way of State Road Numbered 29, and lots 1 to 9, inclusive, of block 40, in Everglades City, Florida, comprising 18.98, 1.32, and 3.17 acres, respectively, as shown on N.P.S. Map No. EVE–NP–E–1, dated June 23, 1959, of Everglades City, Florida; and not to exceed 15 acres of submerged lands lying adjacent to said tracts "R" and "S", if such additional lands are considered necessary by the Secretary of the Interior to permit full utilization of the lands above described; and, in exchange for such parcels of land, to convey to the owner or owners thereof all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the following described parcels of land within the Everglades National Park:

Tract "L" and block 34, comprising 9.09 and 1.65 acres, respectively, lying in or in the vicinity of Everglades City, Florida.

SEC. 2. All lands and submerged lands title to which is accepted by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the provisions of this Act shall, upon the acceptance of title thereto, become parts of the Everglades National Park and shall be subject to all laws and regulations applicable thereto.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DETERMINING THE DISCHARGEABILITY OF PROVABLE DEBTS IN BANKRUPTCY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4150) to amend the Bankruptcy Act to authorize courts of bankruptcy to determine the dischargeability or nondischargeability of provable debts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wonder if someone interested in this bill can tell me whether there is any significance in the fact that there are three or four bankruptcy bills on this Consent Calendar today and there have been other bankruptcy bills passed in the House in this session of the Congress. Is there any significance to this? Is bankruptcy increasing in this allegedly prosperous Nation of ours with its $290 billion of debt?

Mr. FORRESTER. So far as I know, there is not. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would inform him that there have been more bankruptcies in this prosperous Republican administration than we have had in a long, long time.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (a) of section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended (11 U.S.C. 11(a)), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(22) Determine the dischargeability or nondischargeability of all provable debts. If a case is reopened solely for the purpose of determining such dischargeability or nondischargeability, no additional filing fees shall be collected."

SEC. 2. That subsection (a) of section 11 of the Bankrutcy Act, as amended (11 U.S.C. 29a), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) A suit which is founded upon a claim from which a discharge would be or is claimed to be a release, and which is pending against a person at the time of the filing of a petition by or against him, shall be stayed until an adjudication or the dismissal of the petition; if such person is adjudged a bankrupt, any action upon a claim from which a discharge would be or is claimed to be a release may be further stayed until the question of his discharge and the question of the dischargeability or nondischargeability of the claim or determined by the court after a hearing, or by the bankrupt's filing a waiver of, or having lost, his right to a discharge, or, in the case of a corporation, by its failure to file an application for a discharge within the time prescribed under this Act: Provided, however, That such stay shall be vacated by the court if, in a proceeding under this Act commenced within six years prior to the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, such person has been granted a discharge, or has had a composition confirmed, or has had an arrangement by way of composition confirmed, or has had a wage earner's plan by way of composition confirmed."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "Determine" and insert the following: "Upon application of the bankrupt and the creditor concerned determine."

Page 2, lines 4 and 9, strike the words "or is claimed to be".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BASIC COMPENSATION RATES FOR CERTAIN POSITIONS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1845) to provide for the establishment of rates of basic compensation for certain positions in the Patent Office in the Department of Commerce, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 202 of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended (5 U.S.C. 1082), is amended by redesignating the paragraph thereof which was added by the Defense Department Overseas Teachers Pay and Personnel Practices Act as paragraph (33), and by changing the period at the end of such subsection to a semicolon and adding the following new paragraph:

"(34) examiners in chief and designated examiners-in-chief in the Patent Office in the Department of Commerce."

SEC. 2. The first paragraph of section 3 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to fix the rates of basic compensation of examiners-in-chief and designated examiners-in-chief in the Patent Office, at per annum rates not in excess of the maximum scheduled per annum rate of compensation provided for positions in grade 17 of the General Schedule under the Classification Act of 1949, as amended."

SEC. 3. The enactment of the amendments made by the first section and section 2 of this Act shall not affect—

(1) any position of examiner-in-chief in the Patent Office in the Department of Commerce existing immediately prior to the date of enactment of this Act,

(2) the compensation attached to such position of examiner-in-chief, or

(3) any incumbent of such position, his appointment thereto, or his right to receive the compensation attached thereto, until appropriate action is taken under authority of the amendment made by section 2 of this Act.

SEC. 4. (a) The rate of basic compensation of the Administrative Assistant Attorney General, the Administrative Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Administrative Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, the Administrative Assistant Secretary of Labor, and the Administrative Assistant Secretary of Treasury shall be $19,000 per annum.

"(j) The Attorney General is authorized to place a total of three positions in the Bureau of Prisons in grade 17 of the General Schedule. Such positions shall be in addition to the number of positions authorized to be placed in such grade by subsection (b)."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"POSITIONS OF EXAMINER-IN-CHIEF AND DESIGNATED EXAMINER-IN-CHIEF IN THE PATENT OFFICE

"SECTION 1. (a) Section 3 of title 35 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: 'The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to fix the per annum rate of basic compensation of each examiner-in-chief in the Patent Office at not in excess of the maximum scheduled rate provided for positions in grade 17 of the General Schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended.'.

"(b) The last sentence of section 7 of title 35 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows: 'The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to fix the per annum rate of basic compensation of each designated examiner-in-chief in the Patent Office at not in excess of the maximum scheduled rate provided for positions in grade 16 of the General Schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. The per annum rate of basic compensation of each designated examiner-in-chief shall be adjusted, at the close of the period for which he was designated to act as examiner-in-chief, to the per annum rate of basic compensation which he would have been receiving at the close of such period if such designation had not been made.'.

"(c) The amendments made by this section shall not affect—

"(1) any position of examiner-in-chief or designated examiner-in-chief existing immediately prior to the effective date of this section, or

"(2) any incumbent of any such position, his appointment thereto, his rate of compensation, or his right to receive such compensation, until appropriate action is taken under authority of such amendments.

PROMOTING PEACE THROUGH THE REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 300—House Concurrent Resolution 393—a concurrent resolution to promote peace through the reduction of armaments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

This proposed resolution is of major importance not only to the people of the United States but to the people of the entire world. If its adoption might in some manner or measure start a worldwide movement toward peace and disarmament, then it might prove to be one of the most crucial actions taken at this session of the Congress.

It seems to me that such an important step should be judiciously taken. If the world is to have confidence in its provisions, it is my belief that the resolution should be brought up under a rule and debated freely and openly. If the resolution is as significant as I believe it to be, then I likewise believe it should be accorded an appropriate measure and degree of consideration. To do less may raise serious doubts as to the sincerity of our purpose and in these crucial times we must leave no such doubts.

The spotlight of world attention is focused upon the Capitol of the United States. If it be the purpose of the Congress to implement by appropriate resolution the statement made by President Eisenhower on April 16, 1953, then by all means let us implement it with all the power and dignity of which the Congress is possessed. In my judgment, there might be raised considerable doubt as to the depth of our feeling if we bring up and pass such a far-reaching proposal by means of the Consent Calendar.

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I believe we should know more about the implications of this resolution before we give it our stamp of approval. No one can question our dedication to the objectives of the resolution, but we should know more about the commitment it asks us to make for future foreign aid programs. If the integrity of the Congress is to be preserved, we should proceed with great caution and deliberate care when we venture into the field of promises for appropriations to be made by succeeding sessions of the Congress.

I bow to no man in my desire for world peace. I have talked to people in many other countries and if there is a single, common ground it is this mutual desire for peace. But are peace and disarmament of so little value to mankind that they must be bought by promises of economic aid? Can we be certain without hearings and debate what these commitments will entail in the way of demands to be made upon our Treasury in the future? And what assurance have we that our own economy in the process of conversion from a state of cold war to disarmament will be able to bear the burdens here proposed?

If given the opportunity to more fully consider the resolution I might become one of its most sincere advocates, but too little time and consideration have been given this proposal which could alter the entire course of world events.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ZABLOCKI], Is there any intention in this particular resolution to bypass the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. There is absolutely no intent to bypass the Committee on Appropriations. There is no authorization for any funds. There is no money involved. The Bureau of the Budget to the Department of State have no objection as stated in the report.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. The gentleman well knows that the report is based and the entire findings on the merits of the bill relative to the statements by first, former President Truman, and secondly by President Eisenhower who on April 16, 1953, pledged that the U.S. Government was ready to ask its people to join all nations in devoting a substantial percentage of the savings achieved by disarmament to a fund for world aid and reconstruction. What does that word "substantial" mean? And how does the executive department have it within its power to tell the Congress that perhaps $3 or $4 or $5 billion shall go for further foreign aid? Where is that within the rights of the President of the United States?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. It is within the prerogative of the executive department, of course, since he has the responsibility of administering international relations to make a decision as to the amount of assistance to any particular nation. Further to try to clarify the word "substantial" I might say to the gentleman if it is $100 that is involved, then $50 would be a substantial amount. If it is $10 million or $10 billion, one-tenth of such an amount in my estimation would be a substantial amount.

I am sure the gentleman will agree that should there be any real savings, a substantial amount of savings, due to disarmament or to a cutback of military expenditures it would then be the decision of Congress to determine what portion of the savings the Congress would allocate for assisting other nations that are underdeveloped and underprivileged.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I think the gentleman will agree that this Congress has often been in difficulty by bypassing the Appropriations Committee. Just the other day we had an example of that in the matter of the interstate highway program which was taken out of the hands of the Appropriations Committee to study each year, and we now are faced with the fact that the program is practically bankrupt.

We had a similar situation in the housing legislation. To me this has at least the potentiality of continuation of foreign aid, regardless of what the consensus of the Congress might be in the matter. Is there any justification for my belief there?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I would like to assure the gentleman that it is not. I want to assure the gentleman. If I thought such was the intent of this legislation I certainly would not have introduced the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. May I ask this question? This bill passed the Senate on August 4, I understand.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Yes, on August 4.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Over a month ago. If it was so important why did the committee not get a rule to bring it to the floor for consideration long before this?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. In order to satisfy some members, the Committee on Foreign Affairs went into the proposal very carefully. It is therefore understandable that the committee was not able to report it out prior to August 31.

The gentleman I am sure is fully aware that the Committee on Rules is no longer in session. Therefore a rule could not be obtained.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. May I inquire why the Committee on Rules is not sitting while Congress is in session?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The gentleman will have to address that question to the chairman of the Rules Committee.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I do not see any recommendation from the State Department for this resolution. There is simply the statement in the report that they have no objection. Did the State Department come before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Will the Speaker pardon me while I finish this one question?

The SPEAKER. I thought the gentleman wanted to return to the bill and pass it; I did not know the gentleman wanted to fight it.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I was just making the inquiry——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will withhold asking for the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Did the State Department urge upon the Committee of Foreign Affairs that they enact this legislation?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The State Department does not have any objection to the proposal.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. They have no objection?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. As to testifying in favor, I would suggest to the gentleman that the proposal has complete approval of the Department.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. The report does not so state.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. It has already gone over; it was objected to before.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. It seems to me I was the party who originally objected to the consideration of this bill. My purpose in asking that that objection be removed is to retain my right to ask that it go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been objected to.

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I want to withdraw that objection. Have I not the right to do so?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman withdrawing the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSEN of Minnesota. I do not want to be so abrupt as to object; I want to give them another chance to come before the House, so I ask permission that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill will remain on the calendar.

ADDITIONAL BUILDING FOR THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution (H.J. Res. 352) to authorize preliminary study and review in connection with proposed additional building for the Library of Congress.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that we had a quorum call just a little while ago because certain Republicans wanted to be at the airport to meet the President of the United States. They have not returned and will not until around half past 2.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order momentarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, H.J. Res. 352, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, is authorized and directed to prepare preliminary plans and estimates of cost for an additional building for the Library of Congress.

SEC. 2. The Architect of the Capitol is authorized to make such expenditures as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this resolution, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for such purpose the sum of $75,000.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] for 20 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 352 authorizes an appropriation of the sum of $75,000 for a study and survey of preliminary plans for the construction of an annex to the Congressional Library, if, and when, Congress determines the need therefor.

The Joint Committee on the Library has had this matter under consideration for some 3 years. During that time extensive consideration and study has been given to many proposals designed to relieve the acute need for space, storage and other functional operations of the Library of Congress. The Library of Congress must necessarily expand if it is to continue the high purpose for which it was created.

Someone may ask—I am sure they will ask, and properly so—Is this measure an authorization for building an annex, or to furnish architectural plans for a new building for the Library of Congress if, subsequently, Congress determines that such a need is clearly evident? The answer is that it is not an authorization for building an annex. That is the province of the Committee on Public Works which determines the question of erection of all public buildings. Our position here is to bring to the attention of the House that an acute shortage of space is currently hampering the Librarian of Congress in the orderly conduct of carrying out his monumental task of furnishing statutorily all the services demanded by the Congress. This proposal merely requires the Architect of the Capitol to prepare the preliminary plans and estimates of cost, including location, design and other necessary criteria for Congress to consider if, and when, it is its will that the need of further expansion so demands.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is what we think is a farsighted and orderly way of planning. We certainly must produce another facility for the Library of Congress if it is to carry on its expansion, which is my judgment is clearly inevitable. People all over the country, and especially Members of Congress, are demanding services which tax the fullest capacities of the Library. While our population has been increasing tremendously through the post-war years, according to statistics may I cite that the growth of output in the publishing industry has also reached new highs in volumes of printed matter, which are required by law to be retained as Library material. Other services also have been added, including microfilming, preservation of motion pictures of all sorts and kinds, recordings, and a great many other advances in the field of printed arts and sciences. Need I say anything to add to the importance of the Legislative Reference Service as one of the functions of the Library. What more can be said in the face of these growing conditions other than the simple fact that the Library of Congress needs this study of space expansion.

The Library officials appeared before the Committee on Appropriations this year—I think last year, too, as a matter of fact, but this year particularly—asking for an appropriation of a half million dollars that they may rent space which is greatly needed, not only for storage but for the actual working operations to render the type of service that is expected of it. The Appropriations Committee in its wisdom—I do not think it turned it down irrevocably—thought we should proceed along this line, as I understand the contention.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend our colleague and his very able committee for the manner in which they are handling this bill. Chairman BURLESON is exactly right. The Library of Congress officials came to our subcommittee to get funds to rent a building. Now, they desperately need more space. Let us be practical about it. We suggested to them that they go to the proper committee, the Joint Committee on the Library, and explain their needs. We urged them to go on and buy the land and build the building, because the Library is going to continue to grow. It would be the most economical way that this problem could be handled. They want to spend half a million dollars for rental space—which is their minimum request right now. A 10-year program of such rental arrangement would not be conceded to be in the interests of sound economics when we know that these moneys could be applied to building the necessary annex to coincide with the understandable growth of the Library of Congress. Now, that is just how simple it is.

Mr. BURLESON. I appreciate the statement of my colleague from Texas.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman mentioned as one of the services the recording and microfilming in the Library. Is it true at the present time recordings made of historical events or speeches of importance are not made by the Library of Congress as such but is a function within the Library that is not supported by Federal funds, or am I incorrect in that statement?

Mr. BURLESON. I think the gentleman is correct in that direct recording is not, of course, a service of the Library.

Mr. COLLIER. May I ask one other question?

Mr. BURLESON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. COLLIER. Do you not think it is vitally important that some action be taken in this planning program to incorporate in the regular functions of the Library of Congress some means by which a divsion or a department could be set up to record and maintain speeches of this nature, anything that might be of value at some future time, so one could go back years from now and actually hear the recording of, say, the state of the Union address or the inaugural address of the President, which we do not now have?

Mr. BURLESON. I think I may say safely to the gentleman that that is in the plan of the Library operation. They have done some of it to the extent that they have the facilities. But, I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that that is highly important matter and something new that has to be developed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 352 came before our Joint Committee on the Library, and rather extensive hearings were held. Now, as the result of these hearings and because of the fact that our Joint Committee on the Library has a very small staff, I believe it was the consensus of opinion that the members of the committee did not feel qualified to make a decision as to the need, the type, the size, or the location of such a proposed building. Therefore, in following good administrative procedures, the committee felt that it was wise and proper to have a study made by those who are well qualified to make such a study, and that such a study would then be reported to the Congress, at which time the Congress in its wisdom could work its will in deciding whether or not the building as recommended, designed, and located by this study should be built.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HALEY. The gentleman speaks of having this study made by people who are qualified. Would the gentleman tell me what the resolution specifies in that regard? Certainly it is not this National Capital Planning Commission, is it?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, may I tell my friend from Florida that the study would be carried on under the supervision of the Architect of the Capitol, who would employ such architectural and engineering associates and talent as would be necessary to develop the proper plans.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I hope that when this study is made it will be a thorough and complete study, and I hope that we do not have the situation that we had in regard to the housing arrangement of the other body, where many defects in the building were found. I hope that the people who are authorized to make this study are able and are competent.

Mr. SCHENCK. May I say to my friend from Florida that his well expressed question is one of the very definite purposes of this resolution, to make sure that the plans and specifications and study, type, and location, are well documented by persons competent to do so, and that all of that information will then become available to the Members of the Congress, who then may act in their own wisdom as to whether or not the building shall be authorized.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, may I ask this question; this is money to do what? To put an addition on the Library because they need room?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, may I say to my friend from Michigan that this resolution provides $75,000 to make a study of plans and specifications, location, the need for, and the design of an additional building for the Library of Congress. It is not to build an addition to the present building.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Do they lack space now?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no question that the Library is very crowded and lacks space for the proper cataloging and preservation of the books and records which it has.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. May I ask the chairman of the committee, has his committee made any study about the amount of space that is used by, for example, Members of Congress in the Library? Some years ago one of our Members from Illinois, when he was a Member and then for some years after, Mr. Keller, had space in the Library of Congress. Then a few months ago, Mr. Speaker, I read something about a Republican, Mr. George Bender, formerly a Member of the House, and later a Senator from Ohio, had space over there. Just for personal information and for the information of other Members of the House who may be interested, how do I go about getting space over in the Library? What do I tell them I need?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, there has been a great deal of criticism of people ensconcing themselves in the Library for great periods of time. The Joint Committee on the Library 5 weeks ago tightened up the rules on the operation and use of the Library, and I think that will eliminate these criticisms. The proposed regulations for study rooms will be released to all Members of Congress this week. It has no connection with the resolution under consideration, only that the Joint Committee on the Library handles each question as propounded by the Library of Congress officials.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am not critical at all of anything any Member does.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman is not, it would seem that everybody else is.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I understood that many Republicans are going down to meet the President and that is why we cannot have a quorum call right now.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that all of our Republican colleagues have left this very important debate to go to the airport to meet the President, I withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). The point of order is withdrawn. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I hope I can get more time to discuss this matter.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to yield the gentleman additional time. How much times does he require?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I want enough time to correct my very dear friend from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] that all Republicans have gone down to the airport. But I am asking this in good faith, because some of us are crowded for office space. What I want to know is, how may I apply to the Library to get some office space?

Mr. BURLESON. Has the gentleman ever applied?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No; I do not know how to do so. All I want the gentleman to do is to tell me how to get space there.

Mr. BURLESON. I can tell the gentleman that first he has to apply for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting if the gentleman is accurate in what he said to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] about obtaining space in the Library of Congress. Do I understand all a Member has to do is to apply for space in the Library of Congress and he or she can get it?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; the gentleman must apply, and if the space is available he can have a reading room for himself or for designated employees.

Mr. GROSS. Then the gentleman has made in those few words the best argument against this $75,000 appropriation that he possibly could make. Why in the world should Members of Congress be able to go over and get space in the Library of Congress for himself, his staff or some of his friends or for somebody else? If they have that kind of space to dish out over there they do not need a new building, in my opinion.

Mr. BURLESON. That is what the Library is for. You cannot read the books out on the lawn.

Mr. GROSS. Oh, we do not do that, but this is the crack in the door, this $75,000, not a very big one, but it is the crack in the door to another building costing millions of dollars.

Mr. BURLESON. Very definitely it is, and it is not meant to be a crack, it is meant to open the door to provide space which is very badly needed by the Library of Congress.

Mr. GROSS. That is exactly right. Let us have it right out where we can see it.

Mr. BURLESON. Exactly.

Mr. GROSS. It happened in about the same way with respect to the New House Office Building.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURLESON. I have noticed now within the last few days in reading some publications, I do not know what, but supposedly about people who just simply differ in their opinions. The gentleman from Florida made reference to the office building of the other body. Some of them have called it the Taj Mahal. Some say it should be in the zoo. Without making any inference in any way, I have never seen the Taj Mahal, but I have seen the Senate Office Building and I have been to the zoo, and I reserve my opinion as to where it should be placed. But that has nothing to do with the people who occupy it or its functions. It is simply a matter of opinion. Now, that is what we are trying to avoid by this resolution. You see, in 5 or 6 years we hope there is a building. But in the meantime my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS], who is on the Committee on Appropriations and I think a great many other members on the Committee on Appropriations will tell you that for the Congressional Library to carry out its function and meet the demands made upon it today, they are going to have to spend from $500,000 to $750,000 annually to procure about 300,000 square feet additional for storage and Library operation. I do not think we should pay out that rent. The Committee on Appropriations does not want to appropriate money for that purpose. So what we are trying to do, and I repeat what I said a little bit ago, is to have an orderly and sensible development so that when these plans in their preliminary stages are made ready, we can submit them to our Committee on Public Works.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. I am glad to yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes or as much time as I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. If I may continue in your time allotment, Mr. GROSS, these plans, in a very understandable and orderly way, will be submitted to the Committee on Public Works so that that committee can see exactly what is proposed, and if in their judgment, the request lacks substance, they can turn it down and that is all there is to it.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman tell me how much space is presently occupied by Members of Congress, former Members of Congress, their favorites of one kind and another—I will withdraw the word "favorites" and say "preferential customers"?

Mr. BURLESON. There are 226 study rooms over there, all told. They average about 100 square feet per room. About 67 study rooms involve congressional assignments but that does not mean that 67 Members have study rooms. Some are assigned to committees and some are double rooms. It was brought out during hearings that less than 67 rooms are being used by individual Members. In fact, hearings developed that some of the space in those study rooms was being used for shelving seldom-used volumes. The question of allocating so-called study rooms to people plays a very minor part in the overall important question before us. It was set up that way in the beginning.

Mr. GROSS. I do not care about the beginning. Now we are confronted with a $290 billion Federal debt.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes, but we are interested in the beginning. We have to consider knocking out partitions and trying to do something about it. It is just like this glorious Capitol Building—if we had to build it over again there are many nooks and crannies that could be better utilized. There are many ornamental features that are now considered waste of space. But space was not at a premium then as it is today.

Mr. GROSS. The national debt was not at the premium then that it is today.

Mr. BURLESON. Of course, I agree with the gentleman on that; but if we are going to have a Library of Congress and if we continue to make demands on it, and if your constituents and mine are also going to make demands on it, then you have to have a place for the Library to expand and you have to have a place for the people to work. Such a conclusion is obvious.

Mr. GROSS. Let me ask the gentleman this question. Does he agree with his colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] who stated that the rental for the space that they want would cost $500,000 a year and that in 10 years they would have the building paid for? Does the gentleman agree with Mr. Thomas that this new building would cost $5 million.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know what it would cost. I cannot comment intelligently on the estimated total cost. I do not know exactly what his conclusions were. But I do know this, the cost for rental space is estimated to be a minimum cost of $500,000 a year and that is not exactly hay in Texas or Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I agree with you on that, but what is this building going to cost?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know what it is going to cost. That is what we desire to find out; what it is going to cost, and what it is going to furnish as to the need as a public service.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. HALEY. I might state to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Texas, that the gentleman from Florida does have some concern because as I recall it the original resolution that was put through here several years ago for a building program on the Hill was originally for $25,000. We now wind up with a cost of $100 million. And if we are going to follow along in proportion to that of course this building and what you are going to do here is going to cost $300 million.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman an additional minute. Let me repeat to say for the fourth time that what we are trying to do is in an orderly way to bring something before the gentleman's committee so he can see what the cost will be and other details. We are trying to get it in such shape that the Appropriations Committee can take it from there. The gentleman will recall that appropriations were demanded for a Science Building and for the Atomic Energy Commission on the ground that it was an emergency. I do not doubt that it was, but that is what we are trying to avoid here; we are trying to avoid coming in under the plea of emergency.

Mr. GROSS. Some of us are trying to stop some of these buildings.

Mr. BURLESON. I understand that full well and the gentleman is to be complimented, not criticized for his attitude and effort, because I think there is opportunity to save money when things are developed in an orderly way. This is an attempt at an orderly development, whether it comes to fruition 5 years or 10 years from now, or next year; we are trying to be orderly about the proposal. It has yet to come before the Public Works Committee and the Appropriations Committee, and there will be ample time in which to discuss it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would just like to point out that this resolution approaches these problems in a business-like manner and in the same way that any business would do in first making a complete survey of the need, location, and cost along with all details of the construction of any facility it may contemplate to build.

If after these studies are made the Committee on Public Works or the Committee on Appropriations does not feel that it is justified, then that is that. If the House in its wisdom approves such authorization it will then be up to the Committee on Appropriations to determine whether or not the appropriations are proper and in line with the authorization.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. How much time has the gentleman from Ohio remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from from Ohio has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. GROSS. That is what I thought.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken and the Chair announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the agreement of last Saturday further proceedings under the call will go over until tomorrow.

ACQUISITION OF CROPLAND BY EMINENT DOMAIN

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 8343) relating to the preservation of acreage allotments on land from which the owner is displaced by reason of the acquisition thereof by a Government agency in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 378(a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1378(a)), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The former owner of land acquired as described in this subsection shall not be considered for the purposes hereof to have been displaced from such land during any period for which such land is leased to such former owner: Provided, That the occupancy of the former owner under the lease follows immediately after his occupancy as owner: And provided further, That if a former owner has been displaced prior to the effective date of this amendment and no allotment from the land owned by such former owner has been transferred from the allotment pool and such former owner leases the land formerly owned by him prior to one year from the effective date of this amendment such allotment shall be retransferred from the pool to such land and the occupancy of such former owner under the lease for the purposes of this subsection shall be deemed to have begun immediately after his displacement as owner. The provisions of subsections 344(m)(2), 353(e), and 358(g) shall not be applicable to allotments on lands held under the lease by a displaced owner which are subject to the provisions of this amendment."

SEC. 2. Section 125 of the Soil Bank Act (7 U.S.C. 1813) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The provisions of this section shall not be applicable with respect to the leasing of such farmlands to the former owners thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist on his point of order?

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman from Iowa insists on his point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five Members are present, not a quorum.

ACQUISITION OF CROPLAND BY EMINENT DOMAIN

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT] is recognized.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted to me under the second be yielded to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN].

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Under suspension of the rules can time be allotted to a third party?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asked unanimous consent that he be allowed to do it. The Chair put the request and there was no objection.

The gentleman from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 8343, which I have introduced and the Committee on Agriculture has reported, would amend section 378(a) of the Agricultural Act of 1958 and section 125 of the Soil Bank Act. Public Law 835 enacted in 1958 provided a uniform law for the transfer of acreage allotments to new farms when a farm is taken over by the Government under the right of eminent domain.

This law stipulated that upon the acquisition of such land by the Government, any acreage allotment upon it should be placed in an allotment pool and should be available to other farms owned by the displaced farmers. By providing for the immediate transfer of the allotment to the pool and its use limited to providing allotments for "other farms" owned by the displaced farmer, the law prevents a farmer from continuing to use his allotment in his operation under lease arrangement. Obviously this was not the intent of Congress in enacting the uniform acreage transfer law. It has been the Government policy under the law to ease the displacement blow somewhat by permitting farmers to lease back their lands until the Government actually had to take them over. But if a farmer cannot get the allotments back, the Government is leasing him back something far different than he had before the Government exercised its right of eminent domain.

H.R. 8343, in effect, would make it compulsory for the Government to give a man whose land has been taken over for a dam or similar project his farm allotment on that land when he leases it back from the Government for use. Under the present provisions of the law this is not compulsory.

The committee adopted three amendments to this bill:

First. Released reapportionment would not apply—allotments released by former owners would not be assigned to other producers in the same county. The cotton, rice, and peanut laws provide that a farmer will receive credit for planting his full acreage allotment if he releases his allotment for reapportionment in the county. That law would not apply to the allotments on these leased lands.

Second. The provisions of this bill will apply only to farmers whose occupancy has been continuous, and Third. Any displaced farmer who has not acquired any acreage allotment under Public Law 835 may have his occupancy considered to have been continuous if he leases his former farm within 1 year of the enactment of this amendment.

No additional cost will result from this legislation nor would it result in added acreage being planted in allotted crops. These allotments are already in existence and are being planted and even if Public Law 835 is not amended the acreage will go into an allotment pool and will be available for allotment under the provisions of that act. The allotment will be in existence even after the land is inundated.

It is simple justice to take care of people being displaced in the construction of Federal reservoirs. The Government, with or without the consent of the owners, purchases or condemns these lands. It is often times years before the actual flooding takes place and in the meantime the former owners are given a priority in leasing them. In the Eufaula Dam area in my district, and I am sure there are comparable situations throughout the country, some of the better land of the county is being taken over because bottom lands are taken when these big lakes are built. Some of the displaced farmers have farmed these lands since before statehood—50 or 60 years, with farms having come down through generations. The allotments on their land are geared to their farming operations. The farms are valueless without the allotments and conversion to any other kind of operation would require many years work and untold expense.

Another consideration is that unless farmers can begin now to plan for next year, they will be faced with the forced sale of their equipment at considerable loss since there will be so many sales in a short time. In addition, many farmers, and this is true in my district and others, are finding it practically impossible to find a farm to rent in so short a time.

It is important to remember that the amount of land devoted to these restricted crops in reservoir areas is relatively insignificant in terms of State and national acreage. Furthermore, these allotments have been planted for years and will not contribute to the surplus. But the loss of these crops is a personal disaster to the farmers involved and an economic blow to their areas. If the Government is to deal fairly and responsibly with a hardship situation created by Federal construction, it is compelling upon it to correct a problem which has arisen inadvertently through the enactment of Public Law 835.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessary to correct a serious inequity in the law regarding acreage allotments in areas where farmers are displaced through exercise of eminent domain.

In our State of Oklahoma, where thousands of acres are being acquired for needed reservoir construction, we can substantially reduce the hardship of hundreds of our citizens under this proposal.

The able gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT], who is one of the greatest friends the American farmer has in Washington, has clearly explained the terms of the bill and its need to correct an injustice.

I join my colleague in urging favorable action on this bill.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD immediately preceding passage of the bill H.R. 8343, and that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

A TRIBUTE TO LABOR

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 435, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the House concurrent resolution, as follows:

Whereas American labor has raised its standards of productivity to heights unequaled in world history; and

Whereas the efforts of American labor have brought to this country a standard of living that has no parallel; and

Whereas American labor has served the Nation in peace and war; and

Whereas American labor has been a bulwark of freedom; and

Whereas the first Monday in September is traditionally set aside to commemorate the services of working men and women to our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress does hereby express its deep realization and appreciation of the basic role that labor plays in our economy and of the contributions that American working men and women have made to America's well-being.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House concurrent resolution.

The House concurrent resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House Resolution 379, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the House resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order for the Speaker at any time on Thursday, September 10, 1959, and at any time during the remainder of the week, to entertain motions to suspend the rules, notwithstanding the provisions of clause 1, rule XXVII.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. HALLECK. No.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution speaks for itself. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume within 20 minutes.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have no copy of this resolution before me. There is probably only one in existence and it is at the Speaker's desk. Let me ask the gentleman, this provides for suspensions over what period of time?

Mr. McCORMACK. Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of this week.

Mr. GROSS. This resolution, if adopted by the House, will give the leadership of the House authority to bring in legislation during those 3 days, regardless of what it is and without conforming to a rule of the House which provides that 6 days prior to adjournment, upon adoption of an adjournment resolution, suspensions may be in order.

Now you are asking for authority to bring in legislation at any time during the 3 days specified, without previous notification to the Members of the House, and without having adopted an adjournment resolution; is that correct?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, the gentleman overlooks the fact—and I am sure when I call it to his conscious mind, he will appreciate it—that this does not abdicate authority. The leadership is very careful in regard to it. Any bill that is brought up on this basis has to receive the approval of the Speaker, of the minority leader, and the majority leader. Even if anyone does not approve of it, the bill will not come up. That is an arrangement that we have had throughout the years from time to time.

Mr. GROSS. If who does not approve of it?

Mr. McCORMACK. Any one of the leadership. I might advise my friend—and I am sure he will remember it—that the leadership does not exercise that as an arbitrary power. The Speaker and I do not put down bills on the list, on the agenda, without consulting with the Democratic Members, and then seeing that the Republican Members are consulted with. And, the Republican leader naturally does the same thing. So, this resolution thoroughly protects the rights of the Members and, as I said before, when I submitted my unanimous consent request last week, insofar as it is humanly possible for me, as majority leader, I will announce the day before the bills intended to be brought up under suspension. That is only after screening.

Mr. GROSS. I am glad—please do not take quite all of my time—that the gentleman says insofar as it is humanly possible to do so, which may have some meaning and it may not have any meaning whatever. In other words, it is entirely within the discretion of the gentleman on any one of those 3 days to call up a bill without previous notice of any kind.

Mr. McCORMACK. No. The matter of discretion and the exercise of discretion are two different things. Now, the gentleman recognizes that.

Mr. GROSS. I hope the Members of the House understand what suspension of the rules means, and I am sure they do, but I want to remind them that it means exactly what is stated; all rules are suspended. You cannot offer an amendment. Debate is limited to 40 minutes and strictly controlled. The House cannot work its will. Not even a motion to recommit is in order. There is a bill coming up, a highly controversial bill, this afternoon under suspension. That bill should never have been brought here under suspension.

Mr. McCORMACK. Under suspension.

Mr. GROSS. I do not want to belabor this issue, but I am unalterably opposed to this method of legislating. Let me say to the Members of the House that I have heard some of you say that it would be well if we could abolish the last 2 weeks of the session because of some of the legislation that goes through. And I point out that this resolution is before you now without the slightest previous notice or warning. Vote for this resolution and you can expect to get some more of that legislation, legislation that perhaps you do not want and you cannot work your will on. Now, go ahead and vote for it, but do not complain thereafter. I am opposed to it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House have confidence in the intellectual honesty of the leadership on both sides. Certainly, the leadership on both sides falls over backwards, so that no one Member will feel that there has been a sharp practice engaged in, not only next Thursday, Friday, and Saturday but throughout the entire year.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman speaking on his own time?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I have been here not too long, 25 years. I have been here when my side has been in the majority and I am here now and have been here most of the time when my side has been in the minority. So far as I can remember, this sort of an arrangement has always been worked out, and I have found it to be very successful, bringing about orderly determination of legislative matters before us so that we can adjourn in some sort of a reasonable time. So far as I am concerned, I am for this resolution. I am sorry that objection was raised to it. As far as I am concerned, as minority leader, certainly I have been diligent, as diligent as I might have been expected to be, in doing the things that the people on my side expect me to do. There are many areas where we can work together for the accomplishment of things that are good for the country and need to be done, and certainly in that area I want to cooperate with the majority leader. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that we had agreed to suspension a little while back.

I called a meeting of not only the leadership on my side of the aisle but the ranking Republican Members and sent over a list of the bills, one by one, to determine whether or not they should come up under suspension. I think out of that list that was submitted to me there were four or five we thought should not come up under suspension. Certainly it seems to me there is no reason why this sort of resolution should not be adopted and I ask the Members on my side to vote for it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] says this is orderly procedure but I say to you it is harsh procedure because under this proposal for suspension of the rules the membership may not have adequate notice as to what legislation is to be brought before the House. I point out to you that this House has met on approximately 9 Fridays during the past 8 months. We could have had orderly procedure; we could have considered far more bills under the 3-day-notice rule, so that we would know what is going on, if the Thursday to Tuesday club had not been in operation so much this session. Now we are asked to accept a semigag rule and I protest.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think that is to the credit of the House, acting upon business that has come before the House throughout the weeks.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the resolution?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSS) there were—ayes 163, noes 5.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement previously made, further proceedings under this resolution will go over until tomorrow.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means have until midnight tonight, September 7, 1959, to file a report on the bill H.R. 8684, the so-called dealers' reserve bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore announced a list of bills that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will sometime this week, and probably tomorrow or Wednesday, call up by unanimous consent. I am adding to that list the bill H.R. 8684 concerning which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has just obtained unanimous consent for the committee to file a report by midnight tonight.

INCREASED PER DIEM ALLOWANCE FOR TRAVEL

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5196) to increase the maximum rates of per diem allowance for employees of the Government traveling on official business, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representative of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Travel Expense Act of 1949 (5 U.S.C. 836) is amended by striking out "$12" and inserting in lieu thereof "$15".

SEC. 2. Section 4 of the Travel Expense Act of 1949 (5 U.S.C. 837) is amended by striking out "6 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "7 cents", and by striking out "10 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "12 cents".

SEC. 3. The second sentence of section 4 of the Travel Expense Act of 1949 (5 U.S.C. 837) is amended by inserting immediately after "the actual cost of" the following: "parking fees,".

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5196, reported by the Committee on Government Operations, will amend the Travel Expense Act of 1949 to increase the maximum per diem allowance for subsistence and travel expenses for regular Government employees while engaged on official business from the present $12 per day to $15 per day. As you know, the per diem is an amount allowed in lieu of reimbursement for certain actual travel expenses including food, hotel rooms, and incidental expenditures. The bill will also permit the reimbursement of the actual cost of parking fees for privately owned vehicles when engaged on official business. Furthermore, it will increase the maximum mileage rate for privately owned automobiles and aircraft when used on official business from the present 10 cents per mile to 12 cents per mile, and for motorcycles from the present 6 cents per mile to 7 cents per mile.

This is a bill to give to the President and heads of executive departments and agencies the authority and the discretion to set per diem rates and mileage allowances for employees that are more in line with present-day travel expenses than the existing maximum would allow. I wish to emphasize that the allowances contained in this bill are only maximums. We are merely raising the ceiling. The Bureau of the Budget and the department heads set rates based on their knowledge of the costs likely to be incurred on a given trip. There are various rates within the departments and between departments—some of which will not be disturbed by this bill. The department head has the discretion and will keep the discretion to set the specific figure so long as it does not exceed the ceiling we put into the law. But it is clear that revision has been made necessary since the last ceiling was set in 1955 and it is the duty and obligation of the Congress to set maximum rates that will not require Government employees to pay the cost of doing Government business out of their own pockets.

We all know that travel costs have increased. The only questions before the committee was how much have they increased.

The bill as originally introduced called for an increase in the maximum per diem from $12 to $16 per day. The committee, based on the evidence available of it, reduced the proposed increase to $15.

The original bill called for an increase in per diem for consultants serving without compensation from the present $15 to $16 per day. The committee rejected this increase because it wished to keep regular employees and consultants on the same expense basis as far as may be practicable.

The original bill proposed an increase in the actual expense proviso of the Travel Expense Act and the Administrative Expenses Act—the latter covering consultants—from the present $25 to $30 per day. This was rejected by the committee.

The bill as introduced would have raised the mileage allowance for motorcycles from 6 cents to 8 cents per mile. The committee reduced this to 7 cents per mile. It retained the increase for autos and aircraft from 10 to 12 cents.

In all the committee took a conservative approach to the problem while still realistically recognizing the fact of increased cost of travel in recent years.

During our hearings representatives of Government employee organizations presented testimony showing present-day costs of travel and all strongly supported this legislation.

The Bureau of the Budget presented evidence based on data taken from actual expense accounts of Government employees and data from outside sources showing that the total average cost of subsistence—that is for the items such as food, hotel, and so forth, included in the per diem—was now $14.30 per day. The full details of the Budget Bureau's study is contained in the report on the bill and the interrogation will be found in the printed hearings. The Bureau proposed an increase in per diem from $12 to $14 per day. The committee, however, agreed on $15 per day inasmuch as the Bureau's own figures showed a cost of $14.30 per day. Furthermore, the Bureau admitted that its study was not "scientific," thus leaving considerable room for error.

The Bureau of the Budget opposed any increase in auto mileage allowances but members of the committee were aware from their own experience that the cost of operating an auto has increased since 1955. Gasoline is higher, tires are higher, oil is higher, and the autos themselves cost more. As you know, just last week it was the will of the House to raise the gasoline tax 1 cent per gallon. One company which specializes in developing automobile standard allowances estimates that 12 cents per mile is the cost of operating one of the low-priced three cars for 10,000 miles. This estimate takes into account the cost of gasoline, maintenance, and tires, as well as the fixed costs of taxes, insurance, licenses, and depreciation. It was pointed out in the hearings that the Internal Revenue Service recognizes that 12½ cents per mile is a proper allowance for private employers to grant their employees.

The inclusion in the bill of the provision for the reimbursement of parking fees was done on the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget which had found that this had become a significant item of expense to Government employees who use their cars for official purposes and upon the fact that reimbursement of similar costs such as toll charges are already authorized by law.

The provisions in the original bill redefining the term "continental United States" were deleted inasmuch as this would have reduced the present subsistence allowances for travel in Alaska and Hawaii. Travel costs in Alaska and Hawaii are still higher than in the mainland States and under existing regulations issued by the Bureau of the Budget higher per diem allowances are paid.

We were not able to obtain any accurate estimates of the total cost to the Government of the increases in maximum rates proposed by this bill. During the hearings the Bureau of the Budget made a rough informal estimate that an increase in the per diem rate from $12 to $14 would possibly cost in the neighborhood of $20 million, and that this could be absorbed in the 1960 budget without supplemental appropriation requests. Following this rough estimate the increase to $15 as proposed here may cost in the neighborhood of $30 million. The committee anticipates that this figure may also be absorbed.

Reliable figures on the cost to the Government of any increase in mileage allowance are likewise not available. The Bureau of the Budget acknowledged this. We do know that the maximum mileage rate is relatively meaningless so far as computing costs to the Government is concerned. Much of the travel authorized by the various departments and agencies is at a rate below the authorized maximum. A substantial amount of auto travel may not exceed the cost of travel by common carrier. In these cases frequently more than one official Government traveler travels in the same automobile. Only one mileage rate is authorized, and the Government saves the transportation costs of one or more employees. As the report states: "If figures were available taking into account all of these factors, it is not unreasonable to believe that the net cost to the Government of the proposed 2 cents per mile increase would be insignificant. In no case may auto mileage be authorized in excess of the cost of travel by common carrier unless there is a determination that transportation on a mileage basis is more advantageous to the Government."

I believe that the bill, H.R. 5196, is a fair and reasonable exercise of our legislative responsibilities. We only seek to do justice to our Federal employees who must necessarily travel to perform their duties.

I hope the bill will be passed by an overwhelming vote.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am very much impressed with the very fine explanation of the bill by the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania and am impressed by her fairness. I have seen the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania at meetings of Federal employees. Anyone who has will agree it is a rare sight because of the affection, respect, admiration, and appreciation they have for her and her very fine work. They are her most loyal and enthusiastic supporters.

I am very sure this bill will pass because it is only a matter of justice to our dedicated civil servants, a reimbursement of money that should be theirs for expenses for things needed to do the Government's work. Again I commend the lovely and the gracious Mrs. GRANAHAN, who is working so hard in the interest of the Federal employees, and for good and efficient Government.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I thank the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts for her very fine remarks and her great contribution to this bill.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I would like to commend the gentlewoman for the very clear analysis she has before this House of the legislation under consideration. I would like to ask her this question: Is it not a fact that the basis upon which the figures were arrived at in the committee is the same basis that is used by industrial concerns throughout the country?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. That is correct.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LANE. I, too, want to compliment the gentlewoman for her very fine report on a very, very important bill. I am satisfied, too, that the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN] and her very able committee having studied this subject at some length and have brought in to us a very fine report and I wish to congratulate her upon her excellent presentation.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the Travel Expense Act of 1949, as amended in 1955, must be updated, to accord with present realities.

No fairminded person expects that employees of the Federal Government who must travel on official business, should dig down into their own pockets to pay for such expenses.

Apart from equity, it is a practical impossibility for Federal employees to do so, because their wages and salaries are substandard in the first place.

Expense accounts which cover more than lodgings, meals, and transportation have been recognized as an essential cost of doing business by private enterprise for generations. Employees can draw on their respective companies for travel expenses necessary in the performance of their work, or be reimbursed for the same.

We are asked to amend the Travel Expense Act of 1949, as amended in 1955.

It is time that we did so, because the per diem standards of 4 years ago are hopelessly inadequate today. Unless we upgrade these allowances to a realistic level, we shall force more and more experienced employees out of the Government service in sheer self-defense. The present obsolete per diem allowance and mileage allowance compels them to pay for the difference between such frozen allowances and actual costs, out of their own meager salaries. In effect, it results in a pay cut.

Small wonder that the wasteful turnover in Government personnel is higher than in any other group of employees.

Even the Bureau of the Budget has admitted that the total average cost of the subsistence items included in the per diem is now $14.30 per day and not $12 as the present law provides.

The Bureau's testimony stated that: "In our review we found that the present $12 maximum is inadequate to cover the subsistence expenses which a traveler would normally incur in a day." The Bureau arrived at this conclusion after a study of actual expense accounts of Government employees, including hotel rooms, meals, and such incidental expenses as tips, fees, laundry, cleaning, and pressing, telegrams for room reservations, and so forth.

But this cost figure is an unweighted average of the lowest set of expense figures.

This bill also provides for an increase in mileage allowance from 10 to 12 cents for the use of privately owned automobiles and airplanes used by Government employees on official business.

It is apparent that the cost of operating an automobile has increased during the past 4 years.

The Internal Revenue Service recognizes that 12½ cents per mile is a proper and reasonable allowance for private employers to grant to their employees for travel expenses incurred in the course of their work.

Not only is the cost of the automobile itself, and the cost of gas, oil, tires, considerably higher than in 1955, but the maintenance costs, insurance, and taxes have also gone up.

Opposition to the recommended increase in mileage allowance for Government employees become academic in the fact of congressional action authorizing a penny-a-gallon increase in the Federal gasoline tax. For good reason, the Congress itself has added to the cost of operating a car.

The costs of travel subsistence and the cost of operating an automobile on official business have both increased since 1955.

If we are to retain dependable Federal employees and avoid the much greater cost of excessive turnover in Government personnel, we must provide them with realistic allowances while they are traveling on official Government business.

If we do not, they will have to cut corners, resulting in an impairment of their efficiency and a loss to the proper functioning of Government.

By raising the maximum per diem from $12 to $15 and the mileage allowance from 10 to 12 cents per mile we shall avert this danger.

H.R. 5196 will hold the line against deterioration in Government service caused by false economies.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like also to commend the gentlewoman for the great work she has done in the committee and the way she pressed hard in our committee for this legislation. I would like to ask her if this is not true: That what we are doing is trusting the administration within this ceiling. They may set the rate as much lower as they deem necessary in appropriate cases. Is that right?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. That is true; they do not have to use the maximum.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And, in addition to that, in no case can this automobile mileage be authorized where the rate by common carrier is lower, unless in those cases where it would be deemed advantageous for some other reason to have the travel done by automobile rather than by common carrier. Is that true?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. That is true.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain feeling of regret that I feel it necessary to oppose the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania because I know she is devoted and sincere in her efforts to make this bill workable so far as the emloyees of the Government are concerned and for the betterment of good Government. However, I would be remiss in my obligations were I not to point out that there is a certain carelessness in this legislation when we say to a department of Government: "The maximum you are allowed by regulation to spend for travel allowance is 8 cents per mile, but by statute Congress is now allowing 12 cents per mile." Either this Congress is economy minded and we are going at economy from the standpoint of principles or we are careless. Are we going to set the price at 12 cents a mile when there is not a business in the Nation that allows more than 10 cents a mile? I believe if you are going to establish the principle of economy the place to do it is right here in the Congress. How is a bureau of our Government going to practice economy when we here say: "Go ahead, up it to 12 cents a mile"? There is only 5 percent of the businesses in the Nation that even allow 10 cents a mile. Ninety percent of them allow 8 cents a mile or below. So, from the standpoint of principle, it shows a certain carelessness or callousness with regard to the efforts this Nation is presently engaged in when we hear the maximum shall now be 12 cents per mile.

There is another part of this bill which we did not object to very strenuously, but which demonstrate the same type of carelessness. The other phase of the bill has to do with the per diem allowance for travel. I refer your to paragraph 3 of page 48 of the hearings, and I would like to read to you the statement which I made then:

> I have had an opportunity to look over the 1955 hearings before the Subcommittee on Government Operations. The same two firms were employed by the Bureau of the Budget; namely, Harris, Kerr, Forster & Co., were employed then and they also are employed presently. In the 1955 hearings, it is stated that the firm of Harris, Kerr, Forster & Co. quoted the single room average in 1954 was $7.30. The new rate for that same grouping—is $9.04, representing an increase of approximately 20 percent. Also employed in 1955 was the firm of Horvath & Horvath, and at that time they estimated the rate was $6.82 for a single room. At the present the average single room rate by the same company is $8.11. There again that represents an approximate 20 percent increase in cost. Therefore, I am led to the conclusion that when the Director of the Bureau of the Budget in his recommendations raised the expense allowance from $12 to $14, he was following a consistent pattern and we would be well advised to stay within the confines of our actual cost experience.

May I also refer you to page 16 of the hearings of the 86th Congress which gives a summary of the Bureau of the Budget recommendations. The distinguished gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN] referred to the increase in tax on gasoline. She raises that point so that perhaps the minority would be willing to go up a penny and therefore bring this legislation to unanimous agreement. I would refer the gentlewoman to the Internal Revenue Code where she will find that gasoline taxes are a deductible item, so that all of this increase would not be applicable to increased costs of operation. It should be pointed out that a 1-cent increase in gasoline would amount to less than a tenth of a cent increase cost on a per-mile basis.

I would also like to call attention to several other statements that have been made. The Bureau of the Budget opposes any increase in the allowance, and states:

> The present rates are adequate and we recommend no change in the statutory maximum mileage allowance.

Also the General Accounting Office stated:

> We have no information as to the need for an increase in the mileage allowance for use of privately owned vehicles on Government business.

Mr. Speaker, this business of adequately ascertaining what an automobile costs per mile is not easy, but there are certain firms who make that their specialty, one of which is R. E. Runzheimer & Co. I have had submitted to me recently by the chairman of the Government Operations Committee some information which would purport to show that the average per-mile cost of a 1-year-old automobile would be slightly more than 12 cents. I have taken occasion to analyze these figures and I would like to acquaint you with just what goes into making the alleged cost figure to operate a 1958 Chevrolet automobile, based on 10,000 miles use per year. There are certain fixed costs, and I would invite you to think of those as one category, and then there are variable costs in another category. Let us examine the fixed costs first. For such an automobile it is estimated that $647.74 goes for depreciation, for 10,000 miles in 1 year, and the rest of the fixed costs such as insurance and licenses are only $153.24—making a total of $800.98 or 8 cents per mile. So that of the total fixed costs approximately three-quarters of that cost is in depreciation.

But, now, what are the variable costs? The variable costs are estimated to be only $399 or 4 cents a mile. So, here we have a situation where, of the total alleged cost of 12 and some odd cents a mile, over half of that or 6.47 cents is in depreciation.

Now, I say to you, first of all, does a person use his automobile every single day for Government business? What about holidays? What about Saturdays? The entire depreciation would be paid by the Government based on 10,000 miles a year of Government use. Is it right to charge Uncle Sam $647 depreciation for a private individual to use his car 5 days a week and not charge the individual anything for depreciation for the use of his car on weekdays for personal use or on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays for personal use.

I say it is unconscionable to allow 12 cents a mile when there is no industrial firm in this Nation that allows 12 cents a mile and when total depreciation can be chargeable to Uncle Sam even though the automobile may be used extensively for private use.

Now, there are many other spots in this bill that could be economized upon, but the minority do not strenuously object to them.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KEARNS. I think the gentleman has propounded his ideas very well. Here we are now at 3:15 on Labor Day; and if I could present a resolution, it would be that all Members were reported present to pay tribute to industry and labor in this great country of ours on this day.

Mr. BARRY. I thank the gentleman and join with him in such a tribute.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Approximately, what is the cost of this legislation, that is, additional cost to the Government, on mileage?

Mr. BARRY. The additional cost to the Government would only eventuate were the heads of departments to allow a greater allowance under a directive in the form of Government regulations. That does not mean to me that we should set sights that would tend to make the department head raise the allowance. This bill is not a directive; it only authorizes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Assuming that the Government operated under these higher figures, does the gentleman have any idea how much it would cost?

Mr. BARRY. It would go into the millions; but in order actually to estimate the cost, one would have to know the number of miles traveled by privately owned automobiles and then compute it. I do not know, but it would be very large.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. FASCELL. Is it not true that in response to the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] the gentleman from New York did not know the answer? And neither do I.

Mr. BARRY. I said I did not know the answer.

Mr. FASCELL. That is, we cannot estimate how much the increased mileage allowance is going to cost the Government, except from the testimony we have which is that it is insignificant and can be absorbed under present allocations and appropriations.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Nobody knows what it is going to cost.

Mr. FASCELL. Not on the mileage allowance.

Mr. BARRY. That is one of the reasons I am opposed to the bill. We do not know what it will cost.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. HOSMER. What is the travel cost figure for a year for a Chevrolet?

Mr. BARRY. For depreciation $647.74.

Mr. HOSMER. That would be 6.47 cents per mile on a 10,000-mile basis.

Mr. BARRY. That is correct.

Mr. HOSMER. And what is the figure for operation?

Mr. BARRY. $399 or approximately 4 cents a mile.

Mr. HOSMER. That brings it to 10.47 cents a mile or almost 11 cents a mile actual cost.

Mr. BARRY. There are other fixed costs such as insurance and license, and so forth.

Mr. HOSMER. Then it would bring it to over 12 cents a mile according to the gentleman's own figures?

Mr. BARRY. That is true, but that assumes the use of an automobile for 10,000 miles on Government business 365 days a year.

Mr. HOSMER. Oh, no.

Mr. BARRY. Yes, it does.

Mr. HOSMER. That is a miscalculation, because no matter why it is used, the wheels turn around for 10,000 miles and we get our cost figure on that basis; that is, whether it is used on Government business or by the individual for himself. As a consequence, you come up with some 11.47 cents per mile cost plus some admitted extras which have not been included. So actually we are getting by at 12 cents a mile for less than it cost the man to take his car out and use it on Government business. I think that is a pretty good bargain.

Mr. BARRY. If the gentleman will permit me to correct his statement, the depreciation used in the calculation is based on the use of the car for the first 10,000 miles. But there are several factors to be considered. First, there is the assumption that the car is driven 10,000 miles a year on Government business. If the car is driven more than that there is no depreciation on the cost of this further use as all depreciation was charged to the first 10,000 miles of Government use.

Mr. HOSMER. I realize that, and I am delighted to have the gentleman correct me, but thus far he has not done so.

Mr. BARRY. The other factor involved is this. Basically a 1958 car is not the average car used by a Government employee. The figures given by Runzheimer show that there is even a lesser depreciation on cars 2, 3, and 4 years of age.

Mr. HOSMER. My car costs me $85 a month on capital cost, and that is an old 1954 De Soto. Perhaps I am inefficient in the operation of the car—and I probably am—but I am probably in the same category with other individual drivers who drive their own car as distinguished from an organization which furnishes cars to its employees and has the facilities to keep them operating efficiently. As a matter of fact, I do not think the average individual can possibly drive his car for as low a cost as cars that are furnished by Avis or any other car renting firm which has the facilities to keep the cars in perfect operating conditions at all times.

Mr. BARRY. I think if the gentleman will refer to some of the Runzheimer figures he would be assured that the average costs for running a car in this country have been well substantiated not only by them but by the Automobile Association of America and on the basis of 10,000 miles use per year that, they are in accordance with the figures that I have indicated.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. COLLIER. During the course of the hearings on this proposed legislation did any Government employee testify to the effect that he was losing money?

Mr. BARRY. I am very glad the gentleman brought up that question. There is nothing in the record and there was nothing during the hearings to show that anyone submitted such information with respect to the insufficiency of automobile allowances, in the first place. There was no showing that anyone was injured. There were no letters submitted by any branch of Government or by any employee at the hearings or to the committee that there was a need for this increase in allowable mileage rate. So far as I am concerned this was dreamed up and I classify it in the spend-spend classification and I was therefore unwilling to agree that it go on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD my statement to the Government Operations Committee as follows:

STATEMENT BY CONGRESSMAN ROBERT R. BARRY ON H.R. 5196, BEFORE THE HOUSE GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, I am unable to concur in the recommendation of the Committee on Government Operations that the current maximum mileage allowance for civilian employees of the Government be increased from 10 to 12 cents per mile for the use of privately owned airplanes and automobiles while on official business. No evidence or testimony was presented to the committee which would demonstrate a need for the increase. In fact, the Bureau of the Budget recommended against an increase.

The report of the Bureau of the Budget, and the testimony of a representative of the Bureau of the Budget when the committee was considering the increase (H. Rept. No. 683, to accompany H.R. 5196) was to the effect that the current rate is adequate. This conclusion was supported by reference to various reports, as follows:

The American Automobile Association, in a recent report on driving costs, indicated that 10 cents per mile is generally sufficient to cover variable and fixed costs, including amortization.

Runzheimer & Co., a Chicago accounting firm specializing in automobile standard allowances, last year computed costs on a low-priced car 1 year old. Variable costs (gasoline and oil, maintenance, and tires) were estimated at 3.77 cents per mile. Fixed costs (insurance, license and registration fees, and depreciation) were estimated at 7.01 cents per mile, computed on the basis of annual mileage of 10,000 miles. The total cost thus was estimated as 10.78 cents per mile. It was recognized that this figure would vary depending upon annual mileage and age of the car. For example, the Red Book, published by the National Market Reports, Inc., giving official used-car valuations shows that depreciation on a low- and middle-priced car, 5 years old, driven 10,000 miles a year, would be 1.7 cents per mile lower than for a 1-year-old car having a total per mile cost of 10.78 cents.

The Dartnell Corp., a Chicago management consulting firm which makes annual surveys of mileage allowances paid by private business, reports that no mileage allowances in excess of 10 cents per mile was paid by the companies surveyed which reimburse employees on a flat mileage basis. The survey for 1958 showed that 88 percent of these companies allowed 8 cents per mile or less and that only 5 percent allowed as much as 10 cents per mile.

The National Industrial Conference Board, Inc., in a 1959 report "Studies in Personnel Policy, No. 170", based on studies in 1958, reported that of 103 manufacturing firms surveyed, only 10 percent authorized a flat mileage allowance in excess of 8 cents per mile.

The report of the Bureau of the Budget also stated that a large majority of the Federal agencies from whom recommendations were obtained saw no need for increasing the present rate of 10 cents per mile.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER].

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MEADER asked and was given permission to proceed out of the regular order and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter and that his remarks appear following action on the pending bill.)

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. The only point at issue on this legislation today seems to be the question of mileage allowances. The gentleman from California [Mr. HOSMER] who preceded me, put his finger exactly on the answer to the question.

The Budget Bureau in analyzing the question as to whether there should be an increase in the mileage allowance over what is presently allowed in the act, which is 10 cents per mile, recommended no change be made in the statutory maximum mileage allowance. This recommendation was—as stated by the Bureau—based upon the following collective data: Two major agencies reported that they did not need it. One agency recommended 12 cents a mile. Two agencies recommended 11 cents a mile. The Bureau of the Budget said this was not a sufficiently broad base to enable them to make a recommendation. Then they went on to say that a recent report of the American Automobile Association quoted that 10 cents a mile covered all costs of driving an automobile, including the amortization of the cost of the vehicle. At this point we arrive at some differences of opinion. First, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] takes issue with the fact that depreciation is considered part of the cost of the operation of an auotmobile. I am not an accountant. But I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the general standards used by most industrial concerns include depreciation as the major part of the cost in computing the cost of the operation of an automobile: I have here a brochure from the American Automobile Association which quotes Runzheimer & Runzheimer, the very agency used by the Bureau of the Budget and also the agency which establishes this national standard criteria used by over 200 industrial concerns. Here is what they say very simply about depreciation:

It is included as part of the fixed cost. For most motorists the largest single expense of owning a car is depreciation.

There seems to be no question about it despite the opinion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY], there is no way you can avoid depreciation in computing cost and be fair, adequate, and proper. Depreciation is a normal part of the cost of operating an automobile whether it be owned and operated by an employee of the Government or of private enterprise.

In this same report Runzheimer & Runzheimer goes on to compute, just as the gentleman from California [Mr. HOSMER] did in his head a moment ago, that the actual cost of operating a 1958 Chevrolet 8-cylinder, 4-door sedan at 10,000 miles is 11.998 cents per mile, or 12 cents a mile for all practical purposes. So we have two different figures on cost per mile of operation, both attributed to the same source. In order to reconcile the figure of 10 cents and 12 cents a mile we asked Runzheimer & Runzheimer about their figures. Their telegraphic reply to the committee was that the 10-cent figure, cited by the Bureau of the Budget, was dated December 1957; and the second group, or 12 cents per mile cost of operation cited by the American Automobile Association in this brochure is dated January 6, 1959. Furthermore, even the 1959 figures are now under further revision for publishing in the October issue of Sales Management magazine. I think it is a fair assumption that cost figures will be higher and not lower.

So 12 cents per mile seems to be a proper figure allowable as computed and compiled by Runzheimer & Runzheimer as of January 1959.

This is the latest cost figure available to us. The additional cost on this single item has not been estimated because it is practically impossible to do so. But the committee is of the opinion that the total cost to the Government of this single item would not be significant.

Mr. Speaker, since this issue is the only one which has been raised in objection to this bill, and since I respectfully submit the objection has been fully answered and eliminated, this bill should be passed and Government employees thus assured they will receive fair treatment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARRY) there were—ayes 73, noes 17.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the agreement entered into, further proceedings under the call will go over until tomorrow.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD just preceding the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend or revise and extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the bill just under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to an article in the September 1, 1959, issue of the Bulletin of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. This article is written by Clark Mollenhoff, a reporter for the Des Moines Register, who has made a special study of a very important subject. I refer to the right and the power of the Congress to obtain information from the executive branch of Government.

Increasingly congressional committees have been confronted with a refusal on the part of agencies and departments of the Government to provide information necessary for the congressional committees to make intelligent judgments in their legislative jurisdiction and in their investigative work.

The article reviews briefly the history of the efforts on the part of Members and leaders in the House of Representatives, including the efforts of my colleague, the gentleman from Virginia, the Honorable PORTER HARDY, Jr., chairman of the Foreign Operations and Monetary Affairs Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations. I commend this article to the attention of all Members of Congress because of its basic importance to the prerogatives and to the rights and powers of the Congress of the United States. I am not, in inserting this article, endorsing all of the statements made by Mr. Mollenhoff, particularly those which relate to legal problems.

There are two paragraphs particularly which I wish to call to the attention of the Members. One is this paragraph which I read as follows:

> The Congress has made its intentions clear on this matter of executive privilege. Supporters of HARDY'S position concede that the cutting off of funds for the ICA would still leave the Attorney General in a position in which he could thwart the will of Congress.

I do not concede that is an accurate statement of the law.

Another paragraph I will read is as follows:

> Some consideration is being given to further legislation that would give the Comptroller General the right to go to court to force production of records without relying on the Attorney General, a member of the executive family.

If there is such a movement I know nothing whatever about it.

This matter is now of exceptional interest because the other body is considering the mutual security appropriation bill which contains language offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] and unanimously adopted by the House of Representatives. When that bill becomes law we will test whether or not Congress may use its power of the purse to compel respect by Government agencies for the congressional power of investigation.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEADER. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. First of all, let me commend the gentleman for calling the attention of the House to the article by Mollenhoff in the American Society of Newspaper Editors Bulletin and also for calling attention to these particular two paragraphs. It seems to me there is a fundamental error in that approach. In the first place it is inconceivable to me that anybody in the executive branch of the Government would need any prodding to enforce the law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MEADER. I yield further to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. Let us raise no question about this. Personnel in the executive branch who are concerned with this matter are all sworn to uphold the Constitution and to carry out the law. Let there be no assumptions that there will be willful violations either of the provision of the Mutual Security Act which relates to furnishing information to Congress or to the companion provision which the House put in the appropriation bill.

Mr. MEADER. I thank the gentleman and agree with him that this provision should cause no difficulty whatever. It will however compel officials and agents in the executive branch of the Government to respect the right of the Congress to be more informed and accurately informed and completely informed about the public business.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will yield further, I would just like to make this observation. The gentleman from Michigan has been most diligent in trying to preserve and protect the rights of the Congress and I commend him for bringing this matter to the attention of the Congress at this time.

Mr. MEADER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the text of the Mollenhoff article at this point in my remarks:

[From the Bulletin of American Society of Newspaper Editors, Sept. 1, 1959]

MOLLENHOFF REPORT—NEW PATTERN DEVELOPS IN FIGHT AGAINST THE BROAD CLAIM OF EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE

The problem of secrecy in the executive branch of the Government received the attention of the Senate and House, and a pattern developed that could become a standard means of fighting the broad claim of executive privilege.

Irritated with the refusal of the International Cooperation Administration to make certain internal reports available to Congress and the General Accounting Office, Representative PORTER HARDY attached amendments to the bills for authorization and appropriation in the foreign-aid area.

The first Hardy amendment was attached to the foreign-aid authorization bill in the House, and was accepted by the Senate. It provided simply that all reports of the ICA and of an inspector general established for the ICA should be made available to the auditors of the General Accounting Office and the properly authorized committees and subcommitees of Congress.

THE PRESIDENT PROTESTS

President Eisenhower signed the foreign-aid authorization bill with this provision in it, but commented at the time that the executive branch would continue to exert its executive privilege to refuse to make available inspector general reports, evaluation reports, and reports with recommendations in them. The President reasoned that there is a constitutional right for the executive branch to withhold any testimony on records involving advice or recommendations within the executive branch of Government.

Representative HARDY took sharp issue with this, and declared that President Eisenhower and the legal advisers in the White House were using an "item veto" to state what parts of the law would be obeyed and which would not.

At this point, HARDY was successful in attaching an amendment to the foreign aid appropriations bill. It provides that funds shall be cut off from any division of the ICA 20 days after a request for information is refused GAO or a proper committee of Congress.

Despite sharp criticism of this by President Eisenhower as an invasion of the power of the executive branch, HARDY gained support of Democrats as well as Republicans on the Senate side of the Capitol.

HARDY ACTION MAY BE IMITATED

HARDY pointed out that Comptroller General Joseph Campbell has informed the Congress that "executive privilege" claims are hampering his access to records in the auditing of the Navy, Air Force, and ICA. HARDY declared that he is only one of many congressional committee chairmen who are concerned about the refusal of the executive branch to make information available.

Others have indicated to HARDY and to Representative JOHN MOSS that they will seek to use the same type of amendments used by HARDY to force production of records by other departments.

HARDY declared that it is absurd for the executive branch to claim that it is unconstitutional for Congress to use its power over the purse strings to force executive agencies to account to Congress on the expenditure of public funds.

The Congress has made its intentions clear on this matter of executive privilege. Supporters of HARDY'S position concede that the cutting off of funds for the ICA would still leave the Attorney General in a position in which he could thwart the will of Congress.

Some consideration is being given to further legislation that would give the Comptroller General the right to go to court to force production of records without relying on the Attorney General, a member of the executive family.

NATIONAL SECURITY NOT INVOLVED

There has been a tendency on the part of some in the executive department and some newspapers to treat the executive privilege problem as if national security was involved.

The ICA, Air Force, and Navy have admitted there is no problem of defense secrets or diplomatic secrets involved in the refusal to make reports available to the GAO and Congress. There are specific laws which allow secrecy where military security or diplomatic matters are involved.

What is at stake is the claim of the executive department that it can arbitrarily withhold any record from the GAO or Congress if that record contains any recommendation or advice. Leonard J. Saccio, Deputy Director of the ICA, has admitted to Congress that under this definition almost any paper or document could be withheld from the GAO or Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7758) to improve the administration of oversea activities of the Government of the United States, and for other purposes, with amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Overseas Differentials and Allowances Act".

TITLE I—PURPOSE AND DEFINITIONS

Part A—Purpose

SEC. 101. The Congress hereby declares that it is the purpose of this Act to improve and strengthen the administration of overseas activities of the Government by—

(1) providing a means for more effectively compensating Government employees for the extra costs and hardships incident to their assignments overseas,

(2) providing for the uniform treatment of Government employees stationed overseas to the extent justified by relative conditions of employment,

(3) establishing the basis for the more efficient and equitable administration of the laws compensating Government employees for the extra costs and hardships incident to their assignments overseas, and

Part A—General provisions

SEC. 201. Notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 70), the allowances and differentials provided by this title are authorized for and may be granted only to an employee officially stationed in a foreign area unless otherwise provided in this title—

(1) who is a citizen of the United States, and

(2) whose rate of basic compensation is fixed by statute or, without taking into consideration the allowances and differentials provided by this title, is fixed by administrative action pursuant to law or is fixed administratively in conformity with rates paid by the Government for work of a comparable level of difficulty and responsibility in the continental United States, except that such allowances and differentials may be paid to an employee officially stationed in a foreign area who is not a citizen of the United States to the extent that the payment of such allowances and differentials to such noncitizen employee is authorized by any provision of law other than this title.

SEC. 202. Allowances granted under this title may be paid in advance, or advance of funds may be made therefor, through the proper disbursing officer in such sums as may be deemed advisable in consideration of the need and the period of time during which expenditures must be made in advance by the employee or employees. Any advance of funds not subsequently covered by allowances accrued to the employee or employees under this title shall be recoverable by the Government by setoff against accrued salary pay, compensation, amount of retirement credit, or other amount due from the Government to such employee or employees and by such other method as may be provided by law for the recovery of amounts owing to the Government.

SEC. 203. The allowances and differentials authorized by this title shall be paid in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President establishing rules governing payments thereof and the respective rates at which such payments shall be made, the foreign areas, the groups of positions, and the categories of employees to which such rates shall apply, and other related matters.

Part B—Quarters allowances

SEC. 211. Whenever Government-owned or Government-rented quarters are not provided without charge for an employee in a foreign area, one or more of the following quarters allowances may be granted to such employee where applicable:

(1) A temporary lodging allowance for the reasonable cost of temporary quarters incurred by the employee and his family (A) for a period not in excess of three months after first arrival at a new post of assignment in a foreign area or a period ending with the occupation of residence quarters, whichever shall be shorter, and (B) for a period of not more than one month immediately preceding final departure from the post subsequent to the necessary evacuation of residence quarters;

(2) A living quarters allowance for rent, heat, light, fuel, gas, electricity, and water, without regard to the limitations of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529); and

(3) Under unusual circumstances payment or reimbursement for extraordinary, necessary, and reasonable expenses, not otherwise compensated for, incurred in initial repairs, alterations, and improvements to an employee's privately leased residence at a post of assignment in a foreign area, if such expenses are administratively approved in advance and if the duration and terms of the lease justify payment of such expenses by the Government.

Part C—Cost-of-living allowances

SEC. 221. The following cost-of-living allowances may be granted, where applicable, to an employee in a foreign area:

(1) A post allowance to offset the difference between the cost of living at the post of assignment of the employee in a foreign area and the cost of living in Washington, District of Columbia;

(2) A transfer allowance for extraordinary, necessary, and reasonable expenses, not otherwise compensated for, incurred by an employee incident to establishing himself at any post of assignment in a foreign area or at a post of assignment in the United States between assignments to posts in foreign areas;

(3) A separate maintenance allowance to assist an employee who is compelled, by reason of dangerous, notably unhealthful, or excessively adverse living conditions at his post of assignment in a foreign area or for the convenience of the Government, to meet the additional expense of maintaining, elsewhere than at such post, his wife, or his dependents, or both;

(4) An education allowance or payment of transportation costs to assist an employee with the extraordinary and necessary expenses, not otherwise compensated for, incurred by reason of his service in any foreign area or foreign areas in providing adequate education for his dependents, as follows:

(A) An allowance not to exceed the cost of obtaining such elementary and secondary educational services as are ordinarily provided without charge by the public schools in the United States, plus, in those cases where adequate schools are not available at the employee's post, board and room, and periodic transportation between such post and the nearest locality, where adequate schools are available, without regard to the limitations of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529); but the amount of the allowance granted shall be determined on the basis of the educational facility used;

(B) The cost of transporting dependents of an employee to and from a school in the United States to obtain an American secondary or undergraduate college education, not to exceed one trip each way for each dependent for the purpose of obtaining each type of education; but no allowance payments under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph (4) shall be made for any dependent during the twelve months following his arrival in the United States for secondary education pursuant to authority contained in this subparagraph (B). Notwithstanding section 111(6) of this Act, transportation, for the purpose of obtaining undergraduate college education, may be authorized under this subparagraph (B), under such regulations as the President may prescribe, for dependents of employees who are citizens of the United States stationed in the Canal Zone.

Part D—Post differential

SEC. 231. A post differential may be granted on the basis of conditions of environment which differ substantially from conditions of environment in the continental United States and warrant additional compensation as a recruitment and retention incentive. Such differential also may be granted to any employee who is officially stationed in the United States and who is on extended detail in a foreign area. Additional compensation paid as a post differential shall not in any instance exceed 25 per centum of the rate of basic compensation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDAY). Is a second demanded?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Iowa opposed to the bill?

Mr. GROSS. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment I sent to the Clerk's desk is to eliminate a provision of the bill providing that, when authorized by the President, representation allowances could be paid by any department or agency overseas out of administrative funds.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in the 84th Congress, I authorized the Civil Service Subcommittee to conduct a study, in cooperation with the personnel adviser to the President and other executive departments concerned, and to submit such recommendations as it found appropriate for strengthening civilian personnel administration in the extensive oversea activities of our Government.

The subcommittee visited 8 European countries and held hearings and conferences in areas where a large part of the 30,000 American citizens employed overseas are assigned to duty. Based on these hearings and upon completion of the cooperative study, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee unanimously approved a report on oversea personnel administration which was printed as House Report No. 2109, 84th Congress.

The report contained four major areas of recommendation. The first, relating to extension of the competitive service overseas, was placed in effect during the 84th Congress. The House of Representatives on July 6, 1959, approved S. 96, which became Public Law 86-91, placing in effect the second recommendation which relates to pay and employment conditions of teachers in schools conducted for dependents of oversea personnel. The third such recommendation is embodied in H.R. 7758, before us for consideration today. Several bills to carry out the fourth recommendation presently are pending before our committee.

This legislation has been before the committee for several Congresses, either in the form of legislative proposals or introduced bills. In my judgment, it has received very thorough consideration by the committee and by the executive branch. The Department of Defense in the 85th Congress submitted an official recommendation for substantially identical legislation as a part of the President's legislative program in that Congress. H.R. 7758 has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and of the departments and agencies concerned.

The general purpose of the legislation is to improve oversea civilian personnel administration by bringing together in one law a number of varying existing statutory provisions authorizing allowances and differentials for oversea employees of the Government and by extending similar authorizations to those departments and agencies which do not now have such statutory provisions. The objective is to provide substantially equal treatment for all American citizens who work overseas for the Government with respect to allowances and differentials to compensate them for additional expenses, hardships, and inconveniences related to their oversea employment which do not generally affect Government employees within the United States.

In connection with section 523 of the bill, which amends parts of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 granting exemptions for certain allowances for Federal employees, the amendatory language makes no change in tax policy but is merely for the purpose of conforming language suitable to the allowance provisions of H.R. 7758. In accordance with the policy of our committee in considering any legislative provision within the jurisdiction of another committee, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee was consulted on the proposed amendment to the Internal Revenue Code, who has given his approval.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALLHAUSER].

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in wholehearted support of this legislation which will serve to improve and strengthen the administration of oversea activities of the Government of the United States.

This legislation provides for uniformity of treatment for all oversea employees to the extent justified by relative conditions of employment. It recognizes that very fundamental principle that the Government should provide uniform treatment for all of its civilian employees who are assigned to oversea posts of duty with respect to additional expenses necessarily incurred by such employees in relation to their overseas service.

The importance of sound and effective personnel policies in the conduct of oversea programs of the Government is well recognized. Employees assigned to overseas civilian posts are responsible for carrying out very important duties with respect to military and economic commitments in foreign countries.

I wholeheartedly support this legislation because it will strengthen the administration of our Nation's oversea activities by—

First. Providing a means for more effectively compensating civilian officers and employees of the Government for extra costs and hardships incident to their oversea assignments.

Second. Providing for uniform treatment of civilian officers and employees of the Government stationed overseas to the extent justified by relative conditions of employment. Application of this principle of uniform treatment will eliminate certain inequitable and unjustifiable disparities and differences which now exist with respect to the treatment of Government civilian officers and employees stationed overseas.

Third. Establishing the basis for the more efficient and equitable administration of the laws compensating Government civilian officers and employees for extra costs and hardships incident to their assignments overseas.

Fourth. Facilitating for the Government the recruitment and retention of the best qualified personnel for civilian service overseas.

The additional cost of the legislation to the Department of Defense, which has on its rolls 21,000 employees working for the Government in foreign areas, is estimated to be less than $3 million per year. The additional cost attributable to the remainder of the 33,000 employees serving overseas is negligible. I, for one, feel that this is one of the best investments that can be made. I urge adoption of H.R. 7758, as amended.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the subcommittee which approved this legislation. The key word here is "equality." As has been pointed out, all that this legislation would do is to bring some 21,000 civilian employees of the Defense Department up to the standards of the Foreign Service. That is all this legislation does. It is going to cost some money, yes, but that is in the interest of saving more money because we need the very best people overseas.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the hearings on page 25 where I asked Mr. Jackson, Assistant Secretary of Defense, who testified before our committee, as to the need for this legislation. Why do we have to be fair and equitable to the employees of the Defense Department? I think it is obvious, but I wanted to hear what effect the inequality had on the service being given and on recruitment problems. He referred the matter to Mr. Sompayrac, one of the experts who was with him. He, of course, did agree that it would have a substantial effect, and he pointed out—

> Probably the greatest effect of the lack of such comprehensive legislation has been, as Mr. Jackson says, in our inability in some cases to persuade people to go overseas. "The other major effect has been some dissatisfaction on the part of employees who are overseas," according to Mr. Jackson, "because they do not receive certain of the benefits which employees of other agencies may receive. This is a general equalization of benefits available to persons of all Federal agencies overseas, that is what it amounts to."

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland, an able member of the Civil Service Subcommittee.

Mr. FOLEY. I rise in support of the bill and I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Oregon and the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey. I commend them both for the position they have taken.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman from Maryland. In sum, I do not think we need delay on it. This legislation is simply to equalize these benefits, these emoluments, if you like, for oversea employees, which they deserve because of additional cost and hardship of such service. This legislation was unanimously approved by a committee which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MORRISON] headed in the 84th Congress, which went to Europe to look into these matters firsthand. It was approved by our committee, 15 to 3. It was recommended by the Defense Department. It is simply in the interest of equality, and I believe that it should be approved overwhelmingly here.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. KILDAY]. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Would it be possible to have the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee read, without it coming out of his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent that could be done.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be read at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JOHANSEN].

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this bill. I am not going to take a great deal of the time of the House but I would like to point out two or three facts with respect to this legislation. The first of those facts is that this involves an extension of allowances and benefits to some 21,000 civilian employees of the Department of Defense and a total of about 23,000 foreign employees of the United States Government not currently covered under the Foreign Service provisions. In extending the existing benefits to this additional category of employees there has been to my knowledge, and so far as I have been able to learn, no review whatsoever of the existing provisions with respect to special allowances that already exist. We know that there are instances and examples in which, due to these additional benefits including extra compensation for hazardous or hardship conditions, quarters allowances, extra compensation for the mere fact of having oversea duties—we know that there have been instances in which the increases over the normal compensation of the employee run as high as 35 to 50 percent. It is my understanding that the original additional allowances had their legislative origin in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. Apparently there is some question as to jurisdictional authority with respect to any basic review of the overall program.

What we are doing here today is substantially extending this coverage to another large category of employees and doing it without any review of the basic premises to determine the soundness of the existing program.

That is my first objection to this legislation. In the second place, I object to this legislation because it is one more step in the institutionalizing of the program of foreign aid on a basis which will assure its continuance in perpetuity. Just this last week we had a witness before us from the Foreign Training School conducted under the auspices of the Federal Government by Johns Hopkins University. I asked the director of that school who was a witness before the committee and who was testifying about the elaborate and costly training programs being developed in the field of foreign aid, this question: "Is it not true, in your judgment, that the development of programs of this character tend further to institutionalize foreign aid and thereby assure its permanence?" He was a very frank, honest, and candid witness and he replied that that was unquestionably the case.

What we are doing here today relates primarily to the civilian employees of the Department of Defense connected with military assistance programs. I submit that by applying these same standards to this new category of employees in a once supposedly temporary program we are further institutionalizing and guaranteeing the permanence of that program and category of employees.

Of course, we have here the same argument today which we have heard before and hear frequently whenever legislation of this type is offered, and that is that after all the sole purpose is to establish equality. But of course it is an old game and it is endlessly repeated. First we start some new type of benefit in a single instance, then we justify it because of the unusual and exceptional circumstances involved in that instance. Then, as time passes, we have further exceptions and then of course it becomes inevitable we must proceed to provide complete equality in the setup.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the House to some of the new provisions, the new allowances and the new benefits that are provided as a result of this legislation:

Temporary lodging allowances may be granted for not to exceed 3 months after first arrival at a new post and for a period of not more than 1 month immediately preceding final departure.

Providing for leased residence quarters when authorized and when administratively determined to be necessary.

Transportation of dependents for secondary schooling that is the dependents of the civilians attached to the Defense Department and serving overseas.

Transportation of dependents for secondary schooling for undergraduate college work in the United States is authorized.

That is to be completely new for all classified employees.

Cost of storage and transportation to and from storage of household effects of employees.

Transportation of employee's motor vehicle to a foreign post is authorized.

The accumulation of not to exceed 45 days of annual leave is authorized for employees included or transferred from Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

Finally, home leave may be granted after at least 24 months of continuous service overseas.

Mr. Speaker, I say what is needed before we extend these additional benefits and existing benefits to new categories of all employees is to have a thorough and comprehensive review of the present overall program.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It has recently come to my attention in connection with our foreign policy that all the United States is required to do now is to appropriate the money and individuals from other nations who participate in the program determine how and when and where it is to be used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary inquiry is, Is it permissible now under the situation which has developed to move to strike out the last word?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, it is not. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield further to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman has the answer to my question, if he has it in mind.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I do not have the answer to the gentleman's question but I am certain if the matter the gentleman describes involves further laxity in the control of the funds by Congress, I have no doubt the answer to the gentleman's question is in the affirmative.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then all we have to do is to furnish the money.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Of course we are still privileged to exercise that authority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY].

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. Though I am in sympathy with the views of my distinguished colleague from the State of Michigan. I oppose his position on this bill. I think the best method by which he might accomplish his objective of having an overall review of these matters would be for him to join in this legislation. If overseas personnel regulations are unified there will be similar treatment given to a member of the Department of Defense, to the Department of State, and other departments of Government. If he will do this I am confident that this Congress will take the time to make certain that there will be an overall review of the matters that he is concerned about. I think we all should be concerned about them. So I would say to the distinguished gentleman, the way to bring this matter to a head to his satisfaction and to the satisfaction of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Iowa, would be to end this patchwork that has gone on since World War II in various departments of Government who have so many overseas personnel, and to allow this bill to go through the Congress and then review the matter as a body in the appropriate committee in the future.

There are some things that may not have been mentioned here, such as inequities that exist. For instance, I would call your attention to allowances for personal effects taken abroad. There is allowable 7,000 pounds of uncrated personal effects that an employee of the Government may take abroad or an allowable of 8,750 pounds crated. This is too small an allowance for crating, inasmuch as crated personal effects are almost double the uncrated weight. So I say in justification to our personnel overseas we should do everything we can to straighten out certain inequities of which I have touched upon only one due to time limitation on this debate.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. No, not at this time. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

I wonder where these 14 amendments came from? Were these 14 amendments considered in the committee, may I ask the chairman?

Mr. MURRAY. I will say to the gentleman that only the first amendment is of any importance in this bill; the rest of the amendments are just a renumbering of sections.

Mr. GROSS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: What is proposed in section 22 with regard to entertainment?

Mr. MURRAY. There is no such section in the bill. As the gentleman knows the bill, read as amended as required under suspension of the rules, contained my amendment striking it out.

Mr. GROSS. Is not section 22 still in this bill? No amendment is adopted until the bill is approved.

Mr. MURRAY. The first amendment by me strikes out from line 22 on page 8 all that follows down to the end of the paragraph. It strikes out all of "entertainment."

Mr. GROSS. It strikes out the use of administrative funds to buy liquor and provide entertainment; is that correct?

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct. There was no purpose in this bill to buy liquor.

Mr. GROSS. Of course that was the purpose. I call attention to the fact that this is just a sample of how this bill has been handled. It is brought here with 14 amendments. It was not properly taken care of in the full committee, and now, under suspension of the rules, only the chairman can offer amendments.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I do not yield at this time. It does not make any difference how many abuses there are in the present allowances and pay differentials by the State Department and the Foreign Service; no matter how many abuses are being perpetrated, this bill will permit another 20,000 to 30,000 Federal employees to get their fingers in the grab bag. Before this legislation is enacted, Congress ought to set different standards for the State Department and the Foreign Service in the matter of transporting automobiles, furniture and so on and so forth all over the world. Is this legislation immediately necessary?

Let me call your attention to some of the testimony in connection with hearings on this matter. I asked Assistant Secretary Jackson of the Defense Department:

> Mr. GROSS. You say you have an 18-percent turnover. What do you estimate your turnover will be if this legislation is adopted and you are caught up with the Joneses in the State Department?
> Mr. JACKSON. I would like to make it clear that we are not prognosticating any dramatic change in retention by this bill.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. No; I do not yield at this time.

Mr. PORTER asked Mr. Sompayrac, of the Defense Department, if they were having any trouble with recruitment on the basis that their allowances for these various differentials had not been given them, and the answer was that they were having no recruitment troubles whatever.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. No.

Mr. PORTER. The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. GROSS. Certainly I mentioned the gentleman's name in reading the hearings.

Mr. PORTER. Then the gentleman should yield to me.

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman very briefly.

Mr. PORTER. I asked him if the Department fully endorsed the bill.

Mr. GROSS. He said he had no concrete evidence of dissatisfaction on the part of Defense Department employees.

Mr. PORTER. He said a number of things in his testimony.

Mr. GROSS. He said there had been no dissatisfaction.

Mr. PORTER. Both said that this legislation was necessary, that it would help.

Mr. GROSS. I do not yield further.

Mr. PORTER. That they had to have it to keep these people going overseas. I refer to page 25.

Mr. GROSS. In direct response to your statement——

Mr. BARRY. If the gentleman would yield I would like to read Mr. Jackson's statement as presented to the committee.

Mr. GROSS. Let me read it.

Mr. PORTER on page 26 asked this question:

I suppose you do have figures on recruitment in terms of how many people apply for the available jobs. Do they show a progressive decline because of the dissatisfaction arising from these inequitable conditions?

And Mr. Sompayrac said:

No, sir, they don't.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief correction?

Mr. GROSS. No; I cannot yield further.

The question of automobile transportation to oversea posts came before the Appropriations Subcommittee for the Department of State.

On page 558 of the hearings the following appears:

Mr. ROONEY. This comes to quite a substantial amount, does it not?

That is, the shipment of cars overseas.

It comes to about $350,000 or $400,000 for shipping the 791 cars?

Is the fact shown in this sheet that 103 cars come back to the United States, whereas, the balance of these 791 go overseas any indication of a pattern? Is about the same thing true each year?

Mr. BROWN. I think it would, Mr. Chairman.

In other words, the bulk of the cars that are shipped overseas at taxpayer expense are sold there at a profit. Yet those who support this bill want to put thousands of additional employees on a par with the abuses that are now being carried on in the State Department.

Let me read to you some of the costs of transferring people, as appears on page 575 of the same committee hearings. Here is a $6,900 a year FSO–6, total cost of his transfer from Buenos Aires to Havana, $8,563.95, including household goods and so forth. Here is an FSS–10, paid $5,425 a year, total cost of transfer $14,615.05 from Malaya to Norway. There are many other similar examples.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman has put a finger on a real abuse. I think the cure for that is for the Congress to set down a policy that these people shall not be transferred all over the world every few years. About the time he learns his job somewhere, they move him out somewhere else where he has to start all over again, and at a terrific expense to the taxpayers.

Mr. GROSS. Certainly. This bill is a cart before the horse. This bill as I have said, should be given consideration following elimination of the abuses. Read pages 574 and 575 and other pages of the Appropriations Subcommittee hearings which will show you what is happening. Yet you want here today to put 20,000 or 30,000 more people on the same basis.

I urge the defeat of this bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I too rise in support of this bill which has been submitted to the House by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. It is the result of a fine study made by the Morrison committee over a period of time.

Mr. Speaker, American civilians who are working for our Government overseas, put up with many difficulties that they would never have to face at home.

We sometimes forget that Government must compete with private enterprise in the recruitment and retention of qualified personnel.

It is a well-known fact that U.S. corporations with branches or field operations in foreign countries, provide attractive inducements for those who are willing to work away from home. These companies go out of their way to secure adequate housing, provide social and recreational facilities, and make available the various items that are a familiar part of the American standard of living.

American civilians working for the U.S. Government abroad have to contend with hardships and inconveniences that are nonexistent in the United States. To compensate them for these sacrifices, and to insure equal treatment for all, I join with many of my colleagues in support of H.R. 7758, the Overseas Differentials and Allowances Act.

The purpose of this bill is "to improve and strengthen the administration of oversea activities of the Government of the United States. The purpose is to be accomplished by the establishment of a coordinated and reasonably uniform system for more effectively compensating Government employees for additional costs, and for hardships and inconveniences incident to their working assignments in oversea areas."

Although there are other important provisions, the heart of the bill is found under title 11.

Section 211 of the bill adds, for all departments and agencies, new authority, first, for payment of a temporary lodging allowance for a period not exceeding 1 month immediately before final departure of an employee from an oversea post, and, second, for reimbursement of reasonable expenses incurred for initial repairs, alterations, and improvements in order to make substandard living quarters habitable. This section extends to departments and agencies—other than those operating under the Foreign Service Act of 1946 or statutes related thereto, which already have such authority—authority, first, to pay a temporary lodging allowance for a period not exceeding 3 months upon first arrival of an employee at a foreign post; second, to include water as a utility covered by quarters allowances; and, third, to make advance payment of quarters allowances.

Section 221 amends, for all departments and agencies, existing authority to grant a separate maintenance allowance for dependents of an employee in a foreign area so as to permit payment of such allowance where an employee must maintain a separate establishment for his dependents away from his post of duty but not necessarily outside of the country of assignment. This section continues and consolidates for all departments and agencies, authority to pay, first, a post allowance to compensate for the difference in local living costs which are higher than those in Washington, D.C.; second, a transfer allowance upon assignment of an employee to duty at any post in a foreign area or at a post in the United States between foreign assignments; and, third, an allowance for education of an employee's dependents. This section continues, for departments and agencies operating under the Foreign Service Act of 1946 or related laws, and adds, for all other departments and agencies, authority to provide transportation of an employee's dependents for educational purposes.

Section 231 continues and consolidates, for all departments and agencies, existing authority to pay a hardship post differential, not exceeding 25 percent of basic compensation, for conditions of environment at foreign posts which warrant additional compensation as a recruitment and retention incentive.

The working and living conditions of U.S. citizens employed overseas, has a direct bearing upon the success of our oversea programs—both military and economic.

In order to carry out their responsibilities, which could determine whether we have peace or war, it is necessary to provide them with the means and the facilities that will promote the highest morale and efficiency.

The Department of Defense alone employs two-thirds of all U.S. citizens working for the Government in foreign areas.

This bill will encourage the ablest American men and women to serve the United States and the cause of peace with freedom and justice at our outposts around the globe.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the intent and purpose of this legislation is to bring about a more equitable situation with respect to allowance as well as pay for those employed in the overseas service. That is all there is to it. There is nothing world-shaking about this legislation. But this is a step intended in the right direction.

The gentleman from Iowa has pointed out a rather important thing, and that is we should examine the whole picture clear across the board. We need a better balanced situation with respect to employment with the Government.

I think this bill ought to be supported. Our committee, or some committee, ought to make a complete investigation or study into this whole problem and make recommendations to Congress with respect to oversea pay as well as to allowances of various kinds. If allowance rights are being abused they should be stopped. If these rights are too liberal, let us correct them.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a provision in this bill, section 22, at the top of page 9:

> Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, funds available to the departments for administrative expenses may be allotted to posts in foreign countries and to resident missions to international organizations for representation purposes in the promotion of official policies and programs.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MURRAY. That is the very section that in my motion was stricken from the bill.

Mr. GROSS. At this late date, you offer an amendment to take it out of the bill. You concocted an amendment as late as last Saturday to take it out. That demonstrates the consideration proponents have given this bill. This section provided that money appropriated for administrative purposes could be used for liquor and entertainment in foreign countries. That is the kind of a bill we have here. I called attention to this provision and when the bill was being considered in the full committee, but no one attempted to take it out then.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman and I are both opposed to this representation money.

Mr. GROSS. Why did you wait until last Saturday, without consultation with anyone else, to frame an amendment to take it out? It was called to the attention of the committee long ago.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The chairman was happy to strike it out.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I would like to say in answer to some of the arguments that were made against this bill that I kind of go along with this bill. It is not too bad, but it is the policy of these moves that is bad. And, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Personnel in the State Department, we are going into this matter at some length and see what we can do about the policy of moving these people around every 2 years willy-nilly, whether there is any reason for it or not. I think that is where the ill is, and I think that is where the ill needs to be corrected.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the committee in considering this measure took into consideration the possible use of local currencies, counterpart funds, if you will, for meeting these extra costs. I notice that the bill itself, in the statement of purposes, says that this is for the purpose of meeting extra costs and hardships incident to their assignments overseas.

Mr. MORRISON. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia that that would be a very excellent idea, but that is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If they will introduce such a bill, I believe I would be inclined to support it.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman agree that it would be a fine thing to utilize some of these funds which we have overseas to take care of these costs so that we would not have to use dollars?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. In connection with oversea assignments there are occasions when oversea personnel are permitted certain special exchange concessions in the purchase of foreign currency.

Mr. MORRISON. That was taken into consideration in the study and the hearings that were held on this bill.

Mr. HARDY. But that policy is still permitted, I take it.

Mr. MORRISON. That is correct, in many places. In some places they do not have the advantage of that.

Mr. HARDY. So the allowances in this bill would be in addition to any special concession which may be available through that sort of a gimmick?

Mr. MORRISON. No. This brings these people up, who are not on any direct legislation, equal to all of our other foreign service employees.

Representatives of both the Departments of Defense and State have indicated that any advantages in the monetary rate of exchange are taken into consideration by the Government in establishing the cost-of-living and other benefits to Federal employees stationed overseas.

Federal employees overseas are paid their salaries in American dollars. However, all exchanges into local currency must be made on the official rate of exchange. Black market exchanges are cause for the Federal Government to bring an employee back to the United States.

In general, however, no department has a hard and fast rule, oversea employees are paid in local currency at the official rate of exchange for quarters allowance, cost-of-living allowance, and education allowances.

Mr. HARDY. Well, now, if the gentleman would permit on that point so that we may be clear, there are countries, for instance, in connection with studies which my subcommittee has recently made, in which special concessions have been given and are being given in the way of special rates on the purchase of foreign currencies.

Mr. MORRISON. All that was taken into consideration in the preparation of this bill and in reporting it out.

Mr. HARDY. Then, in other words, that will not be permitted in the future; at least, they will not be permitted to both have that and the concession in this bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I think they will continue to have whatever concession they have been getting. But that has been taken into consideration in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further on that point, because that is extraneous matter and not directed to the subject matter of the bill. I would like to explain this bill.

Mr. HARDY. I disagree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. MORRISON. Well, that is your privilege.

Mr. Speaker, the two opponents of this bill have tried to give the impression that this bill came out of the committee without thorough study. Two subcommittees voted in favor of this bill and the full committee voted it out with only three dissenting votes—practically unanimous.

This legislation was started 4 years ago by an intensive oversea study by a subcommittee that went to practically every city in Europe and very carefully held full hearings. A printed book of hearings about 4 inches thick resulted from these hearings and studies. Then when we returned the committee made its report. In turn, another subcommittee took it under their jurisdiction. Then it was reported out of the full committee with only three dissenting votes.

Now let us get the record straight about this bill. There are no extra-pay provisions. It merely brings the civilian employees overseas up to same basis and with the same benefits as those covered by former laws governing Department of State employees and some Defense civilian employees.

President Eisenhower wants this bill.

The State Department wants this bill.

The Defense Department wants this bill.

The Comptroller General is in favor of this bill.

The Bureau of the Budget has no objection.

The Civil Service Commission wants this bill.

This legislation is based on the principle that the Government should compensate its civilian employees at oversea posts for additional expenses related to their service overseas which are not incurred by Government employees within the United States, as well as for hardships and other conditions of environment at oversea stations which justify additional compensation or allowances.

At the outset, I want to emphasize that the great majority of benefits written into the law by this bill are already available to large groups of oversea Government personnel—in some instances pursuant to statute and in others under informal approval by the General Accounting Office granted as a matter of necessity with the understanding that the legislation now embodied in H.R. 7758 would be requested.

The general purpose of the legislation therefore, is to bring together existing statutory and administrative policies in a single law, with such additional provisions as are necessary, in order to provide a coordinated and reasonably uniform system of allowances and differentials to be granted U.S. citizens employed by the Government overseas on an equal basis so far as is practicable.

To carry out this purpose, H.R. 7758 groups together in one act provisions now found in a number of separate laws and administrative regulations, and fills in gaps where the lack of appropriate statutory or administrative action has created inequities in respect to certain groups of oversea employees.

Enactment of H.R. 7758 will materially improve and strengthen the administration of oversea activities of the Government. Both operations and personnel administration will be facilitated by the establishment, under this bill, of a comprehensive allowance and differential policy which will apply generally to all American citizens who are employed in civilian posts for the Government in oversea areas, regardless of the department or agency for which extent justified by relative conditions of employment.

This legislation is based upon, and will place in effect, an official recommendation of the Department of Defense. It also carries out the unanimous recommendations of the Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee contained in the subcommittee report printed as House Report No. 2109, 84th Congress. The bill now before us was developed through extensive hearings and conferences held by the Civil Service Subcommittee in oversea areas during the 84th Congress, supplemented by a continuing cooperative study by the subcommittee, the Department of Defense, the State Department, the personnel adviser to the President, the Civil Service Commission, and the General Accounting Office.

I believe the Members will be interested in a brief comment on House Report No. 2109 which was included in a letter from the White House to our committee chairman, dated August 24, 1956, and I quote:

I would like to say first that this was an excellent report, carefully prepared and reflecting a comprehensive review of the facts, both in the oversea hearings and in the staff research. I believe that the liaison between your office and both my White House office and the Civil Service Commission has been a fine example of cooperative effort between legislative and executive branches of Government, in developing sound legislation in this field of personnel administration.

It is fair to state that no bill ever considered by our committee has had more thorough and painstaking consideration by a subcommittee or has been worked out more carefully, in relation to all departments and agencies, in order to strengthen management and personnel administration of essential Government functions.

I should like to invite the special attention of the Members to the explanation of the bill in the accompanying report, House Report No. 902. In my judgment, this is one of the most complete and exhaustive statements accompanying any bill reported to this House in the present session and fully reflects the careful and extensive consideration this legislation received both in the Civil Service Subcommittee and before the full Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

I would like to emphasize the careful consideration this legislation received by calling your attention to the fact that transportation of motor vehicles under subsection (f) of section 331, will be authorized only upon a determination by the department or agency head concerned that it is in the interest of the Government for the employee to have the use of the motor vehicle at his post of duty.

This legislation is strongly recommended by the administration and is necessary to modernize and strengthen civilian personnel administration in our critical oversea defense activities and other essential Government programs abroad. The reported bill has the overwhelming support of the membership of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and I believe will receive equal approval by the House today.

I urge the House to vote favorably on this meritorious legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House all time has expired.

The question is, will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 7758, as amended?

The question was taken and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHANSEN) there were—ayes 72, noes 24.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHELLEY). Pursuant to the order of the House of last Friday, further proceedings will go over until tomorrow.

FINAL ORDERS OF SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 8429) to amend the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 to provide for a procedure under which certain final orders of the Subversive Activities Control Board with respect to Communist organizations may be made applicable to successor organizations, with amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (64 Stat. 989) is amended by inserting, immediately after section 13A thereof, the following new section:

"PROCEEDINGS WITH RESPECT TO SUCCESSOR ORGANIZATIONS

"SEC. 13B. (a) When there is in effect a final order of the Board determining that any organization is a Communist-action organization, a Communist-front organization, or a Communist-infiltrated organization, such final order shall also be applicable with respect to any organization determined by the Board under this section to be the successor of such organization, regardless of the assumed name, from and after the date on which the order of the Board granting the determination that such organization is a successor organization becomes final.

"(b) Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that any organization is the successor to any organization determined by a final order of the Board to be a Communist-action organization, a Communist-front organization, or a Communist-infiltrated organization, he may file with the Board and serve upon such organization a petition for a determination that such organization is such a successor organization. In any proceeding so instituted, two or more affiliated organizations may be named as joint respondents. Whenever any such petition is accompanied by a certificate of the Attorney General to the effect that the proceeding so instituted is one of exceptional public importance, such proceeding shall be set for hearing at the earliest possible time and all proceedings therein before the Board or any court shall be expedited to the greatest practicable extent.

"(c) Each petition shall be verified under oath, and shall contain a statement of the facts relied upon in support thereof. Upon the filing of any such petition, the Board shall serve upon each party to such proceeding a notice specifying the time and place for hearing upon such petition. No such hearing shall be conducted within 20 days after the service of such notice.

"(d) The provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of section 13 shall apply to hearings conducted under this section, except that upon the failure of any organization named as a party in any petition filed by or duly served upon it pursuant to this section to appear at any hearing upon such petition, the Board may conduct such hearing in the absence of such organization and may enter such order under this section as the Board shall determine to be warranted by evidence presented at such hearing.

"(e) In determining whether any organization is a successor organization, the Board shall consider, among other things—

"(1) to what extent, if any, the management of the affairs of such organization is conducted by the same individuals who conducted the management of the affairs of the Communist organization alleged to be the predecessor of such successor organization;

"(2) to what extent, if any, the policies of such successor organization are the same as the policies of the Communist organization alleged to be the predecessor of such successor organization;

"(3) to what extent, if any, the assets of such successor organization are the same as the assets of the Communist organization alleged to be the predecessor of such successor organization; and

"(4) to what extent, if any, the membership of such successor organization is the same as the membership of the Communist organization alleged to be the predecessor of such successor organization.

"(f) After hearing upon any petition filed under this section, the Board shall (1) make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and its conclusion with respect to the issues presented by such petition, (2) enter its order granting or denying the determination sought by such petition, and (3) serve upon each party to the proceeding a copy of such order. Any order granting any determination on the question whether any organization is a successor organization shall become final as provided in section 14(b) of this act."

SEC. 2. Subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of such act (50 U.S.C. 793 (a) and (b)) are amended by inserting ", or subsection (f) of section 13B," in each such subsection, immediately after "section 13A,".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I require.

Mr. Speaker, in proceedings under the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 the Subversive Activities Control Board on June 30, 1955, found the Jefferson School of Social Science to be a Communist front organization. Subsequently and before the Communist front organization registered it announced that it had dissolved. Shortly thereafter the organization moved to a new location, moving the old furniture and office equipment, and went back in business under a new name, the name being the Faculty of Social Science. The evidence adduced at the hearings by the Committee on Un-American Activities disclosed that this is a familiar pattern followed by Communists in order to avoid the impact of the law. The bill (H.R. 8429) is designed to permit the Attorney General of the United States to petition the Subversive Activities Control Board for leave to proceed against the newly erected organization in order to show that it is the successor to the organization against which the original order had been entered. I think, Mr. Speaker, in order to prevent any group from laughing at the laws of the United States it is essential that the recommendation of the Department of Justice and the Board be agreed to.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. SCHERER. Is it not a fact that these hearings before the Subversive Activities Control Board require months of hearings and exhaustive investigations and then after the finding is made if these organizations can just change their names and escape the penalties of the Board's findings an actual fraud is perpetrated on the Government of the United States?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; that is the situation exactly. As a matter of fact in this particular case the people who conducted this school made the announcement in the Daily Worker so that everybody was advised of what had happened. But the Government is powerless to proceed against this new organization. The bill (H.R. 8429) which the Committee on Un-American Activities has reported favorably, makes applicable to a successor organization the final order of the Subversive Activities Control Board made against a predecessor organization. The bill has procedural provisions governing the manner in which the Board may make a determination that a particular organization is in fact a successor organization.

In a few minutes we will consider, I suppose, a bill having to do with passports. The lawyer who went to the Supreme Court on behalf of the Communist who sought a passport was a former professor of this school, Professor Boudin. He is the lawyer who has been appearing so successfully before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. While I was chairman of the special committee as far back as 1934 that was appointed to investigate communism, nazism, fascism, and bigotry——

Mr. WALTER. May I ask the gentleman why he relinquished a post in which he was distinguishing himself?

Mr. McCORMACK. I realized many years later that a much better man than I, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], would assume the distinction and the responsibilities.

Mr. WALTER. The gentleman is most generous.

Mr. McCORMACK. As the gentleman remembers, out of that committee came a recommendation for what now is the Smith Act, the Foreign Agents' Registration Act, the tightening up of our immigration laws in relation to subversive persons, and giving the Army and Navy and the Air Force the power in peacetime to control subversive activities in the installations of our armed services.

I know the tremendous pressures that are brought upon the members of the Committee on Un-American Activities. I know the influences that operate to try to undermine the effective work of the chairman and the members of this committee, and I want to express my hearty congratulations to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] and the members of the committee on both sides for the outstanding work they have done. With resolution and courage they have protected our country against subversive individuals and against sabotage.

I want to ask my friend a question or two. I am wondering if my friend can give the House any information as to whether or not in recent months, if not the last year or two Communist activities in America have increased?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; I do not think there is any question about that. We know it has increased since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Yates case. Shortly after the decision was handed down, at a meeting of the Communist Party in California the leader of the party announced that this decision was the greatest contribution made to the Communist cause in many years, and then said: "We will now move forward."

The movement has increased. Unfortunately, too many people in high positions regard communism as a political movement. It is not political in any sense of the word; it is part of the international conspiracy the object of which is world domination. The thing that disturbs me about the visit of Mr. Khrushchev is not that he is the head of the Government in effect, but that he is the head of the international conspiracy. When he comes to the United States he will come here as the head of the world Communist movement of which the Communist operations in the United States is one tentacle.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I ask my friend in view of his statement about Mr. Khrushchev being the head of the Government; as a matter of fact, within the Soviet Union he is not, technically, the head of the state, is he?

Mr. WALTER. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. He is the head of the party, and within the Soviet Union the state is not supreme, the party is supreme.

Mr. WALTER. That is it, precisely correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. With the United States and other countries, without the Soviet Union we deal on a nation to nation basis; within the Soviet Union the party is supreme. Technically in fact, he is not the head of the state. Is that right?

Mr. WALTER. That is absolutely correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is: Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF PASSPORT BILL

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider under the general rules of the House the bill (H.R. 9069) to provide standards for the issuance of passports, and for other purposes; that general debate continue for not to exceed 1 hour, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half controlled by the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order until a consent request can be acted upon?

The SPEAKER. It is too late to do anything. He held the floor and the Chair declared that a quorum was not present. The only thing that can take place now is a call of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

PROVIDING STANDARDS FOR THE ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9069) to provide standards for the issuance of passports, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9069, with Mr. RILEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN].

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Since June 16, 1958, it has been impossible for the United States Government to deny passports to persons who are active supporters of the international Communist movement even though they openly acknowledge that fact and frankly state that they are going abroad to further the cause of international communism. On that date in June a year ago, the Supreme Court handed down two decisions—Kent against Dulles and Dayton against Dulles—in which the Court ruled that the regulations of the Secretary of State denying passports to supporters of the world Communist movement were invalid because of a lack of specific legislative authority.

Let me quote from a speech made in Moscow in March 1959—only a few months ago—by James Jackson, the secretary of the American Communist Party National Committee:

Dear Comrades, on the authority of our national executive committee and on behalf of our delegation, I bring you the heartfelt greetings of the Communist Party of the United States. Comrades, if President Eisenhower could say in truth what Premier Khrushchev stated as a simple matter of fact—that there is not one political prisoner in the country—several of our comrades might be here to greet you on this extraordinary occasion; our national secretary, Comrade Eugene Dennis, our honorary chairman, Comrade William Z. Foster, Comrades Hobson, Flynn, Davis [three names indistinct], and others; also our dear Comrades Henry Winston and Joe Green, who still languish in Federal prisons in our country.

Jackson goes on to say:

Certain imperialist circles within our country have brought great shame upon our country in Latin America, the Middle East, Hungary, and elsewhere. The leaders of our people, however, are increasingly struggling to remove these stains from our national honor, to establish a new course in foreign affairs, to replace brinkmanship with peace, economic blackmail with fair trade practices, enmity against the countries of socialism with new relations of friendship and coexistence.

The reason why I cite these particular statements is not that Mr. Jackson, an acknowledged Communist, actively supports the Communist line but that Mr. Jackson was present in Moscow attending a conference of Communists sponsored by the Soviet Union, bearing a U.S. passport which he obtained by entirely legal means and which our State Department, much as they desired to do so, could not deny him.

In July 1958, the State Department informed the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it had some 70 applications for passports pending from persons with known Communist affiliations, many of which the State Department would have denied if it had not been for the Supreme Court decision. During the recent hearings conducted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the bill now before the House, we were informed that presumably all 70 of these passports had been issued. How many more U.S. passports have been granted to active supporters of world communism cannot be determined because since the Kent against Dulles decision, the State Department no longer investigates the background of applicants for Communist activity.

The question has been asked: What is the emergency that requires passport restrictions such as are proposed in this bill?

In the first place, let us not forget that the Soviet Union and Red China openly advocate the overthrow of our system of government. We are drafting 9,000 of our young men a month because of this emergency. Most of our people, I am sure, are very much aware that an emergency exists.

That there is a particular emergency relating to passports is also clear. Since the Supreme Court decisions of June 1958, our State Department has been required to issue passports to known and active supporters of international communism. Some of these people are undoubtedly traveling throughout the world today on missions detrimental to our security.

During hearings on this bill, the Honorable Robert Murphy, Under Secretary of State, submitted a list of specific examples of cases involving active supporters of world communism who have received U.S. passports since the Supreme Court decisions of June 1958. The concrete examples submitted by Secretary Murphy follow:

Since June of 1958 a considerable number of old-line, hard-core Communist Party members have come forward to get their passports. Some of them apparently have no present intention of traveling but want to be in a position to do so in the event the party decides they are needed someplace abroad.

Communist Party activities involving travel abroad have taken a noticeable upturn during the last year.

The Department has received information which shows a rather clear disposition on the part of Communist passport recipients to disregard the geographical restrictions in their passports. A number of such persons who, under our invalidated regulations would not have received passports, have, on receiving them, gone almost immediately into areas for which their passports are not valid.

It is difficult to estimate the extent to which the Communists have taken advantage of the gap in our system of laws designed to safeguard the national security since the Supreme Court decisions of June 1958. A large number of applications have been received from persons about whom the Department has some evidence of Communist affiliations. This number, of course, is increasing daily. Under the Department's previous regulations the record of these persons' activities would have been scrutinized very carefully and further inquiries would have been made where necessary. There is no doubt that a substantial number of them would not have received passports under the procedures previously in effect. Some undoubtedly would have turned out to be eligible under the regulations and would have received passports. It is impossible to make an accurate estimate of the number in either category, however, since the Department does not feel that it can justify the time and the trouble involved in endeavoring to determine the extent of a person's connection with the Communist conspiracy when it can no longer deny passports on such grounds in any event.

The information the Department happens to have already available, of course, varies in each individual case. Some have previously applied for passports and were turned down; others are notorious or avowed members of the Communist Party; a great many others are persons about whom the Department has only fragmentary information. Some of the latter group might, on further inquiry, turn out to be no longer involved in Communist activities or relatively harmless joiners or dupes. However, others might well turn out to be extremely dangerous Communist activists.

It should be emphasized that there is presently no congressional authorization enabling the Department to deny passports to any member of the Communist Party, U.S.A. Any or all of them, those who have not already done so, could come in tomorrow and receive their passports merely by demonstrating their citizenship, except in the unusual cases where they might also be a fugitive from justice or a law violator. Thus, a major aspect of the present danger is the total effect on the orderly conduct of our foreign policy and our national security involved in the completely unrestricted travel of as many proponents of the Communist conspiracy as it determines to have travel. The outside bounds of this loophole in our defenses are entirely up to the Communist apparatus to set.

The Communists have not hesitated, where their purposes could be served, to take full advantage of the opportunity open to them.

For example, James Jackson, a member of the Communist Party since 1933, and a member of the National Executive Committee of the Communist Party, recently went to Moscow to address the 21st Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union as an official representative of the Communist Party of the United States of America. While there, he excoriated the United States in statements which, of course, were widely publicized by Radio Moscow. Jackson told the Department on his application that he wished a passport to visit France. There is no formal indication of what altered Jackson's travel plans; but, in any event, his mission was made much easier and his travels more convenient by the valid U.S. passport he had with him.

The general manager of the Worker, William Lorenzo Patterson, is at present a holder of a valid U.S. passport. Patterson, who runs the Worker and for years headed the Civil Rights Congress, has recently admitted under oath before a committee of the U.S. Senate that he was presently a member of the Communist Party. That Department does not know whether Mr. Patterson has yet traveled or where, although his passport application listed various countries in Europe and the Soviet Union. On previous trips abroad, however, Patterson was in close contact with Communist Party functionaries of other countries.

Anna Louise Strong, a life-long Communist, who had been previously denied passport facilities, traveled from Moscow into Communist China in late 1958, where, according to the Department's information, she has for months now participated actively in Peiping's "hate-America campaign."

The recent efforts of Harry Bridges to further his influence among labor movements of the maritime nations could, in the event of Communist-inspired aggression in the Far East or elsewhere, be a matter of gravest concern to this Government. The Department feels that these efforts were facilitated when it was required to afford him passport facilities. Mr. Bridges, according to our reports, traveled to such places as Tokyo and East Germany which were not included in the itinerary he furnished the Department on his passport application.

The Communist-sponsored Seventh World Youth Festival, held in Vienna, Austria, from July 26 to August 3 of this year, was one of the latest Soviet efforts to reap political and propaganda dividends. Intensive preparatory steps were undertaken by the Soviet-controlled organizations behind this festival and, within this country, all possible efforts were made to assure control over the approximately 350 Americans who were expected to attend the festival.

Fortunately, many of the young citizens who attended the festival were loyal Americans. Others, however, including many who were prominent in the festival organization and planning, were strongly pro-Communist and devotees of this Soviet propaganda show.

Among the Americans at the festival were youths already well indoctrinated along Communist lines. One festival participant had a background of active affiliation with the Labor Youth League and was associated with numerous Communist-front organizations. This person has been prominent in the formation of a Communist Party youth group and was in attendance at a Communist Party function.

Another festival delegate, and one who was active in forming the American delegation, received previous organizational experience through the formation of a Marxist-Leninist organization under the authorization of a State Communist Party committee. This person has been active in Communist Party youth activities and reportedly is a member of the Communist Party.

A close relative of a prominent Communist was also a festival participant. This person's background includes close affiliation with the Communist youth organizations and association with Communist-front organizations.

Two other persons, who attended the festival, have been affiliated with organizations created and dominated by the Communist Party for the purpose of attracting and indoctrinating American youths. One of these persons was a member of the executive committee of a Labor Youth League club.

These cases illustrate the type of youths selected by the Communists to represent the United States. The impressions they created and the impact of their actions are not easily gaged but they, and the others so trained and instructed, had as their purpose the discrediting of the loyal Americans who were present and, in every way possible, the embarrassment of this country, its policies, and its leaders.

Although concerned regarding the attendance of these and other persons at the festival, and fully aware of their Communist backgrounds and activities, the Department of State was nevertheless unable to deny any of them passport facilities.

There are set out below additional illustrations of the kind of individuals who have received passports subsequent to the Supreme Court decisions of June 1958.

CASE NO. 1

This person is a charter member of the Communist Party (CP). He founded and is president of International Publishers Co., Inc. He has held any top posts in the Communist Party during the past 30 years. He is believed to have acted as liaison man between the Communist Party and high ranking Soviets. He was a delegate to the Fourth Congress of the Communist International and has attended numerous high-level convention, conference, and committee meetings of the Communst Party in Russia, Germany, Canada, Mexico, France, and Cuba.

CASE NO. 2

This person has been identified with the Communist movement since the mid-1930's, and has been an elector for the presidential and vice presidential candidates on the Communist Party ticket. This person was reported to be a Communist Party member in Trieste, Italy, during the 1950's. In 1956 this person allegedly effected the transfer of funds to the Communist Party of Trieste.

CASE NO. 3

This person has been identified as a charter member of the Communist Party and is known to have been active in the Communist movement for the past 20-odd years. He was a delegate to the All-Slav Congress in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, in 1946.

CASE NO. 4

This person, in 1949, was a witness for the defense in the case of the U.S. v. William Z. Foster, and testified that he was a member of the Communist Party and had joined the Communist Party in 1929. He also testified that he had held numerous posts in the Communist Party, including membership on the national committee. In 1950 and 1954 he attended Communist Party meetings and conventions outside the United States. He has been recently characterized as one of the most important functionaries of the Communist Party.

CASE NO. 5

This person, a member of the Communist Party for many years and once a full-time paid functionary of the Communist Party, has also been active in the affairs of the Communist Party in England in recent years.

CASE NO. 6

This person, who has been identified as having held Communist Party membership under another name, has recently served as the private secretary of a prominent member of the American Communist group in another country.

CASE NO. 7

This person, who previously served as executive secretary of a Communist Party unit in New York, has reportedly toured the world as an international Communist courier.

CASE NO. 8

This person, allegedly a Communist Party member, was active in Communist-inspired front organizations and while enjoying the benefits of a U.S. passport, is reported to have attended an espionage training school abroad. She violated the travel restrictions in her passport during 1955 when she traveled in Poland, Czechoslokavia, and the U.S.S.R. While residing abroad, subject married a Communist official of a foreign country and reportedly will seek to bring this person to the United States.

CASE NO. 9

This person reportedly held a previous assignment which involved furnishing information to officials of a Communist country as to the names of persons in this country who were active anti-Communists and who had relatives behind the Iron Curtain.

CASE NO. 10

This person has a long history of Communist Party activities, having served as a Communist Party functionary. She is reported to have visited Guatemala in 1954 and obtained information for the use of the Communist Party, U.S.A.

CASE NO. 11

This person previously traveled to Communist China, the Soviet Union, Poland, and Czechoslovakia in violation of the restrictions in his passport. He served as a delegate to the so-called Peiping Peace Conference, after which he condemned the United States for engaging in germ warfare.

CASE NO. 12

This person has been active in the Communist Party over an extended period of time, serving as a Communist Party functionary. She previously has attended a number of Communist-sponsored international conferences on both sides of the Iron Curtain.

CASE NO. 13

This person joined the Communist Party as early as 1924, and was, at one time, involved in a scheme of counterfeiting for the purpose of financing Soviet espionage. Using the birth certificate of a dead Communist, he obtained a passport under the name of the deceased and used this passport in furtherance of the counterfeiting scheme. Fortunately, he was apprehended, tried, and convicted, but throughout his trial Communist Party financial assistance was provided. The Communist Party reportedly considered this person extremely loyal and following his conviction continued efforts were made to effect his release. He has now received a U.S. passport and is free to travel abroad wherever he may be ordered by the leaders of the Communist conspiracy.

CASE NO. 14

This person, with a long record of Communist affiliations, has resided abroad for an extensive period and has traveled throughout Western Europe, behind the Iron Curtain and in Communist China repeatedly ignoring travel restrictions imposed on his passport. He has continually criticized the United States as endorsing "slave labor" camps in the South. While visiting Communist China, he falsely charged that Chinese students were being forcibly detained in the United States. In speeches and writings he loudly praised Communist Chinese advancements and castigated high U.S. officials for what he termed discriminating actions against the Negro population. Much use was made in the Communist press of this person's attacks on the United States.

CASE NO. 15

This person, a longtime member of the Communist Party, is a specialist in the organization and recruiting fields. He has been extremely useful to the Communist Party over the years. Because of his organizational ability, he was transferred, apparently under Communist Party orders, to various sections of this country where he was able to supervise and direct Communist Party activities and members. He now has passport facilities and is free to extend his activities abroad.

The Secretary of State has very accurately summarized the situation by saying that there is ample evidence that dangerous participants in the international Communist conspiracy have hastened to "take advantage of the breach in our defenses" which now exists as a result of the above-cited decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I shall be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHELF. I would like to say to the gentleman that he and his committee have done a very fine job, an exceptionally good job. I was very pleased to have been able to be here on Saturday last when this very bill was discussed at quite some length. The fact of the matter is, as the gentleman remembers, I asked that additional time be granted to the gentleman from Oregon so that it could be well discussed.

It is a bill which I think is l.p.d.—it is long past due—and I am for it and I am for what it wants to do. I am for the State Department. For once in their life they were right in denying passports to those birds who speak against America. I have always thought it was a mistake to let these fellows go abroad talking when they should stay right here at home listening. Hell. That is where they belong. Excuse me.

Mr. SELDEN. I thank the gentleman.

At first glance, the solution to the problem might appear to be simple and obvious. Let me point out that the Supreme Court raised no constitutional issue with respect to the denial of passports. The basis of the Supreme Court decisions was that the Secretary of State in denying passports to Communists in the past had acted without specific legislative authorization from the Congress. The apparent solution to the problem is for Congress to pass a law giving the Secretary the authority which the Supreme Court says he lacks.

I am sure that the overwhelming majority of the Members of the House believe that it is important that active supporters of world communism should be prevented from traveling outside the United States for the purpose of advancing the Communist cause and that we should not grant them passports which inevitably facilitate such travel.

At the same time, everyone who studies the problem is confronted at once with the fact that the drafting of legislation giving to the executive the authority necessary to prevent the travel of persons clearly intending to serve the interests of the international Communist movement and clearly embarking on a course of action which would be detrimental to U.S. security is very difficult to do without at the same time giving the executive discretion which may infringe the liberties which are guaranteed to U.S. citizens by our Constitution.

This is the basic issue with which the Foreign Affairs Committee has been struggling for more than a year. The problem is to find a way to keep active adherents of the world Communist movement from going abroad to carry on their work, without giving the Secretary of State authority so broad that it might be used to deny passports to individuals merely because they held unpopular views or because they advocated policies contrary to those favored by the administration in power.

H.R. 9069 which is before the House represents the Foreign Affairs Committee's effort to reconcile this conflict. It is the result of full hearings and careful study by the committee. There were 23 bills which had been referred to the committee relating to passports. These bills represented a variety of methods for dealing with the problem, and the analysis and discussion of the various approaches which they involved was very helpful to the committee in arriving at a final judgment. The bill reported represents a combination and reconciliation of features contained in many of them.

The committee has not attempted to report a comprehensive passport bill which includes a revision of existing passport legislation. The purpose of the present bill is merely to grant the necessary authority so that the executive can take action to meet the most urgent needs of the present situation.

The bill contains a finding by the Congress that the international Communist movement is hostile to the United States; that it constitutes a clear, present, and continuing danger to the security of the United States; that travel by couriers and agents is a major and essential means by which the international Communist movement is promoted; that the possession of a U.S. passport protects the holder and facilitates his travel, and that consequently the issuance of passports should be denied to supporters of the international Communist movement for use to further the purposes of that movement. Before a passport can be denied, however, the Secretary of State must make two findings: First, that the applicant either is or has been, since January 1, 1951, a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party, or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged, since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement, and, second, the Secretary of State must also determine that such person's activities or presence abroad would under the findings made in section 5, as added by the bill, be harmful to the security of the United States.

Both of these findings must be made before a passport may be denied or revoked. The bill does not permit denial or revocation of a passport on the sole ground of membership in any organization or association with any individual or group. Nor does it permit the denial or revocation of a passport on the sole ground that the individual's activities or presence abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States. The bill does not, however, restrict such authority as the Secretary of State already has to deny or revoke passports.

Let me emphasize that this authority is definitely limited so that no one can be denied a passport merely because he once belonged to the Communist Party or to any other organization. The bill specifically states that—

The Secretary of State shall not deny a passport to any person solely on the basis of membership in any organization, association with any individual or group, adherence to unpopular views, or criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policies.

I would like to point out further that this authority would not authorize the denial of a passport solely on the grounds that a person is at present an active supporter of international communism. The Secretary of State has to find, in addition, that the activities or presence of such person abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of State to require as a prerequisite to the issuance of a passport that the applicant take an oath as to whether he is or has been since January 1, 1951, a member of the Communist Party or a supporter of the international Communist movement. The date January 1, 1951, in the opinion of the committee members, clearly gives protection to those persons who may have innocently been adherents of the Communist Party in the past but who have seen the error of their ways.

The Korean war began in the summer of 1950. The nature, purpose and methods of international communism were fully discussed and exposed in the United Nations in succeeding months. No one, after January 1, 1951, could have any excuse for not being fully aware of the meaning of the international Communist movement and of the significance of his affiliation with it.

The fact that lines 3, 4, and 5 on page 3 of the bill contain the words "association with any individual or group," "adherence to unpopular views," "criticisms of the United States or its domestic or foreign policies" has been cited as indicating that passports could be denied to persons to whom such words might apply. A reading of the bill makes clear that this is not the case.

No one can be denied a passport under the authority of this bill unless he is or has recently been an active supporter of international communism. The bill gives no authority to deny passports to anyone else. The words at the top of page 3 should be read only in context.

The bill endeavors to give the fullest possible protection to the individual against the misuse of secret information. No application for a passport may be denied and no passport may be revoked except after an opportunity for a hearing. The bill provides further that in the case of the denial, such hearing shall be held in the judicial district in which the applicant resides. In addition, the bill provides that any such denial or revocation of a passport shall be subject to judicial review on the record in the district courts of the United States. The words "on the record" give to the individual assurance that the courts will have the right to review the record of the hearing on which a determination was made to sustain the denial of his passport; and if that evidence and record do not fulfill the requirements of this law, then the court may overrule the denial, and the Department may be required to issue a passport to the applicant.

I am sure there are those who will say that in our efforts to protect the rights of the individual the committee has left open too many loopholes. There is no doubt that under the language contained in the bill, persons actively engaged in the world Communist movement may succeed in obtaining passports. The committee is well aware of the fact also that people can cross the borders of the United States to enter Canada and the American Republics without passports. The committee has been informed that there is an active market in forged U.S. passports and that these are available to key Communist agents and couriers.

Nevertheless, we are convinced that the restrictions contained in this bill will help the Secretary of State in dealing with the serious problems with which our country is confronted.

In the first place, well-known persons cannot travel on forged passports. It should be recognized also that there are many people who will not be willing to apply for a passport if they know that their record of Communist affiliation will be fully explored and ultimately publicized.

Another consideration is the fact that when known Communists are forced to use irregular or illegal means of obtaining documents to authorize foreign travel, these activities have in the past uncovered new links in the Communist apparatus not previously known to intelligence agencies.

Title II of the bill gives legislative authority to the President to restrain the travel of all citizens and to limit the validity of all passports with respect to travel to designated countries or areas. Such limitations are required to be established by annual declaration and the reasons for such limitations must annually be stated specifically and in detail.

Travel may be restrained only to, first, countries with which the United States is at war; second, countries or areas where armed hostilities are in progress; and third, countries or areas to which the President finds that travel must be restricted in the national interest either because the U.S. Government is unable to provide adequate protection to citizens traveling therein or because such travel would seriously impair the foreign relations of the United States.

The bill authorizes the President to make exceptions to any such geographical restraints for particular individuals or categories of persons.

Section 202 of the bill forbids travel by a citizen to any country which has been declared off limits under section 201 of the bill, and violators are made guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $1,000.

An argument has been made against the bill on the ground that it gives the President authority to deny passports to Members of Congress with the result that Members of Congress may be prevented from discharging their official duties.

In the first place, let me point out that the first part of the bill which authorizes the issuance or denial of passports to individuals grants such authority only with respect to individuals who are active in their support of international communism. I do not believe that any Member of Congress is now or will in the future be engaged in such activity, so that the authority of this part of the bill clearly does not have any relation to travel by Members of Congress.

Title II of the bill, which gives authority to establish geographical limitations for the validity of passports, clearly does apply to Members of Congress. It seems to me, however, that the bill rather than giving the President additional authority which he does not now possess over the travel of Members of Congress, instead limits and gives precise definition to such authority.

The latest and most pertinent statement of the law with respect to geographical restriction on travel is contained in Worthy against Herter, decided June 9, 1959, by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Let me quote from this decision:

> We think the designation of certain areas of the world as forbidden to American travelers falls within the power to conduct foreign affairs. The bare determination that certain areas outside this hemisphere are trouble spots, or danger zones, is a phase of foreign affairs. * * * A decision on the part of the President to prevent, if possible, the necessity for calling into play his diplomatic instrumentalities and the use of his powers—persuasive or compulsory—upon a foreign Nation is a phase of foreign affairs. The selection by him of the means to be used in a given such case rests in large part upon policy, obviously foreign policy.
> We think that, if the Executive foresees that the presence of American citizens in a designated foreign area may, by reason of military or political conditions there, evolve into, or be the occasion of, a clash, diplomatic or military, with a foreign government, his power in respect to foreign affairs includes power to refuse to sanction the travel of American citizens in that area. To hold the contrary would be to hold that the protection of the peace against American-caused incidents in foreign countries is outside the realm of foreign affairs. Such latter holding would be both illogical and unrealistic. In foreign affairs, especially in the intimate posture of today's world of jets, radio, and atomic power, an individual's uninhibited yen to go and to inquire may be circumscribed. A blustering inquisitor avowing his own freedom to go and do as he pleases can throw the whole international neighborhood into turmoil. Worthy's avowed intent is to seek "especially stores that involve the risk of war."

The Court in the Worthy case makes a very clear and convincing argument that under the Constitution the President already has power to impose geographical limitations on travel. What the bill does is to establish procedures and limitations with respect to such travel restraints. It is more correct, in my judgment, to say that the bill makes it possible for Members of Congress to carry out their official duties rather than otherwise.

The restrictions on travel to areas authorized by the bill apply to everyone. The bill does not grant authority for the President to say to each individual passport applicant: "You are authorized to go to country A but not to country B." Any restriction must apply to everyone.

The President can declare that travel to country A is forbidden to all citizens, but he cannot say that such travel is forbidden to John Smith alone.

The bill, however, authorizes exceptions to the general geographical limitations imposed. The President is authorized to make exceptions for individuals or categories of persons. This clearly would permit the President, even though he had declared Red China or any other country or area "off limits" for American citizens, to make an exception so that Members of Congress or other individuals, such as the mothers of Americans imprisoned by the Red Chinese, could receive passports to visit such areas.

The only way that the President can deny any Member of Congress the right to visit any particular part of the world is to impose a general restriction applicable to everyone on travel to that area.

The argument that the bill gives the President power to grant or refuse passports to Members of Congress or to anyone else on the basis of whether or not the views or attitude of such individuals are acceptable to the President is unfounded in fact. Let me quote this additional paragraph from the decision in the Worthy case, which I think is pertinent:

> The in terrorem argument that to sustain the Secretary's power in this case is to confer upon him an unrestricted discretion to grant or to refuse passports is wholly unimpressive. He has not exercised such a discretion. He does not claim it, and we are not considering any such power in the remotest degree. The claimed power, so far as this case is concerned, is narrow and clearly delineated.

The bill strengthens the control of passports by the Secretary of State. The State Department has informed me informally that although the bill contains certain provisions with which the Department does not agree, it contains a much larger number of provisions which it considers to be excellent, and that on balance it believes the bill to be desirable and helpful.

It cannot be claimed that the passage of this bill will assure that no active Communists will be able to travel outside the United States. It will, however, give the Secretary of State authority to deny passports to a considerable number of persons who without this legislation will receive passports and whose presence abroad is definitely detrimental to our security. I believe that the bill deserves and will receive the overwhelming approval of the House.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I strongly favor the passage of H.R. 9069 which authorizes the Secretary of State to deny or revoke passports of persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement. I introduced a similar bill.

This legislation is necessary because the Supreme Court by a 5 to 4 decision ruled that the regulations of the Secretary of State, denying passports to those Communists actively engaged in the world Communist movement were invalid.

Since this ruling has tied the hands of the State Department to prevent travel abroad by Communists, concerning whom the State Department has sufficient evidence to believe their activities abroad would endanger the security of the United States, I believe this legislation is urgently needed. I am convinced there are a considerable number of Communists whose activities abroad would be detrimental to the United States and they should be prevented from traveling by enactment of this bill.

It also provides that the State Department can restrain travel in countries with which the United States is at war, in areas where armed hostilities are in progress, in areas where the President finds that the U.S. Government is unable to provide adequate protection to citizens traveling therein, or where such travel would seriously impair the foreign relations of the United States.

I do not feel this bill goes far enough. I want to protect the individual citizen's right to travel and I believe sufficient safeguards are contained in the bill, such as judicial review, which would protect the citizen's rights under the Constitution. But in determining if a Communist's activities abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States, it seems to me the State Department must in some instances make such a finding on confidential information. This bill would not permit such evidence to be considered but the finding of the Department must be "on the record." I think there should be some discretion left to the Department in this field. Information received from abroad from confidential sources, if disclosed, might jeopardize even the lives of those furnishing such information and dry up or destroy valuable sources of information important to the security of the United States.

Nevertheless I believe this bill is a step in the right direction and should be passed. Time is of the essence and we should stop the travel of those citizens now abroad who are endangering our security or may wish to go abroad.

It is my sincere hope the Senate will pass a similar bill this session of Congress for our own security.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 9069, a bill to provide standards for the issuance of passports and for other purposes. This bill is a necessary and overdue step in our continuing effort to protect ourselves from the Communist menace. It gives authority to the Secretary of State to deny to or to revoke passports of persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement. But, it is also important to remember that such denial or revocation can only be made after there has been a finding by the Secretary that to permit such persons to go abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States. Furthermore, any such denial or revocation is subject not only to administrative, but also to judicial review, so that the rights of the individual are given the most complete protection against arbitrary action by the Executive.

Prior to July 16, 1958, the Secretary of State had exercised the authority to deny passports to supporters of the world Communist movement. On that date the Supreme Court in two decisions—Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, and Dayton v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 144—ruled that the regulations under which the Secretary had acted were invalid because of a lack of specific legislative authority. This bill attempts to supply that authority.

Last year shortly after the decisions above referred to, the President requested the Congress to enact legislation granting authority to deal with this matter. The House, pursuant to that request, took action and did pass a bill, but because of the ending of the session of Congress, the Senate did not have time to act. Since the convening of the 86th Congress, the executive department has renewed its request for legislation of this type.

Under the terms of the bill before us today, a passport may not be denied or revoked until the Secretary of State has found that a person is "a member of or affiliated with, the Communist Party, or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged, since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement."

And then, secondly, the Secretary must find that such person's activities or presence abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States. Certainly, these and the other safeguards either present in existing law or established by this bill provide adequate assurance that the rights of individuals will be protected.

It is not anticipated that this can stop the foreign travel of all Communist sympathizers who seek to harm our Nation, but it will make possible the exercise of some control over it.

Some concern has been expressed as to the number of people who might be affected by this legislation. In the record of the hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee on page 3, the Honorable John W. Hanes, Jr., Administrator, Security and Consular Affairs, Department of State said:

> The loss of our ability to stop American members of the Communist apparatus from getting passports has blunted the other weapons we have against the Communist conspiracy. For example, our success in preventing the entry of foreign Communist agents and couriers with their financing and instructions from headquarters becomes rather hollow if American members of the apparatus can travel freely out of the country. Similarly, the most successful penetration of the domestic Communist apparatus by agents of the United States is rendered much less useful if the persons can evade observation for extended periods of traveling abroad, probably behind the Iron Curtain where we can hardly expect to know what they are doing.
> The Communists have invariably stepped up their activities whenever we have let the bars down. At one time the dangerous members of the conspiracy, if they had to travel abroad, had the alternatives only of doing so illegally without a passport, or of resorting to fraud and falsification to get passports, and thereby exposing themselves to criminal prosecution. Today an American Communist does not have to resort to fraud—there is no incentive for it. He may get a passport, in his own name, on his own birth certificate, with his own picture. He can require his Government to legalize and assist his travels. This is the facilitation he wants and needs.
> I would like briefly to try to put the problem of control of Communist travel in proper perspective. For the 2 calendar years preceding the Supreme Court decisions of last summer, over a million passports were issued or renewed. Out of this group, 51 were initially and tentatively turned down because of alleged affiliation with the Communist movement. These individuals were afforded access to an elaborate hearing and appeal machinery. Indeed, in the entire 6-year period since that machinery was established in 1952, the Secretary of State—and it must be the Secretary personally—finally denied passports on Communist grounds to only 15 persons after they had exhausted their administrative remedies. Some others were granted passports after hearings; and some did not contest the Department's ruling.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me urge most strongly that this legislation be enacted at this time. It has been given careful thought and study now for a period of over a year. It takes away no prerogative that ought to be granted to any citizen of the United States and it establishes fair standards for any refusal or revocation of a passport. This is a step which we must take for our national preservation and well-being.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORGAN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I urge the support of the House for H.R. 9069. The need for legislative authority for the Secretary of State to deny passports to known, active Communists is apparent. Since June 1958 active members of the Communist Party and persons openly affiliated with international communism have been able to obtain U.S. passports on demand, and they are moving freely to all parts of the world. There can be no question but that travel of such persons in foreign nations is harmful to our security and that we ought to do all that we can to restrict it.

The problem which the committee faced in reporting a bill to deal with this matter is the problem of giving the necessary authority while protecting the liberty which American citizens are guaranteed under our Constitution. In our effort to impose restrictions which prevent those intending to further the international Communist movement from traveling, we must be sure that we do not give the Executive so much discretion that passport can be denied arbitrarily to persons merely because an official in the State Department would prefer that they remain at home. H.R. 9069 as reported by the Committee represents our best effort, after detailed hearings and careful consideration, to reach a solution of this problem.

I am convinced the bill gives adequate protection to the liberties of the individual. It gives no authority to deny a passport except to persons presently or recently actively engaged in the furtherance of international communism, and even restricts this authority to cases in which the Secretary of State makes a finding that the activities or presence of such persons abroad would be harmful to the United States. No person can be denied a passport without an administrative hearing and any denial of a passport is made subject to review by the courts on the record.

This bill will not plug all the loopholes nor prevent all travel by supporters of world communism outside the United States. It will, however, give the Secretary of State authority he does not now have and which he earnestly seeks and urgently needs.

The choice confronting the House is whether we do something to assist in meeting the present emergency or whether we do nothing. If this bill does not pass, the State Department will be faced with the necessity of continuing to issue passports to active Communists. If the bill becomes the law, the State Department will be able to take action which will add to our security.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARNAHAN].

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the bill authorizes the Secretary of State to deny passports to or revoke passports of persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement. Such denial or revocation is made contingent upon a finding by the Secretary that the activities or presence abroad of such persons would be harmful to the security of the United States, and any denial or revocation of a passport under this authority is made subject to judicial review.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, enforced imprisonment in one's own home or within the domain of one's own country is still imprisonment.

The denial of a passport is the act of a jailer which cannot carelessly and arbitrarily be taken, nor is it an act that Congress can authorize according to its desire or its whim. Any measure in this area that the Congress may pass is certain to have the closest and most penetrating scrutiny as to its constitutionality by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In its consideration of H.R. 9069 the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been conscious of the danger to individual rights unless in the bill there were adequate protection of those rights and of the difficult question of constitutionality.

The State Department insisted on the power to deny a passport on secret information furnished from undisclosed sources in this or a foreign nation. This power, it was the judgment of the committee, should not be granted.

The committee also rejected the proposal that a judicial review should be limited to a submission of the secret and undisclosed evidence, en camera, to a judge sitting in chambers.

I wish to make it clear, as an expression of legislative intent, that the provision in lines 22, 23, and 24 on page 3 was intended by the committee to assure the giving to the court and its consideration by the court of all the facts and all the evidence, with a full disclosure of information of a so-called secret nature and identification of its sources.

As the denial of a passport is in effect a sentence of forced imprisonment within the applicant's own country the committee felt the applicant denied a passport was entitled in right, in justice, and under the Constitution to a judicial review on the record with all the rights, privileges, and safeguards of the accused facing imprisonment in a penitentiary on conviction of a crime in a trial court and seeking review in a court of appeals.

This was the clear intent of the committee after full discussion and long deliberation.

The committee also rejected the proposal that judicial review could be held only in the district court in the District of Columbia. This would have placed an unfair burden on an applicant residing far from the District of Columbia. H.R. 9069 grants the right to a judicial review on the record in any Federal district court, and again I repeat the intent of the committee is that nothing shall be withheld from the court. It is the thought of the committee that withholding from the court or from the applicant seeking judicial review any evidence or charges on which the denial of passport was based would be unconscionable, contrary to the American concept of justice and probably unconstitutional. The committee flatly turned thumbs down on the request of the State Department for power to refuse passports on the strength of reports from espionage agents that were not revealed.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree that the State Department has made a case as to the urgent necessity of this legislation. Apparently that is the thought in the other body since no action is contemplated there at this session. But I do agree that if a bill setting the standards for the issuance and denial of passports can be framed that adequately protects the rights of individuals and that comes within the Constitution, we should pass it on the chance that it will do some good in guarding our country against evil conspirators to our undoing.

Under the guidance and inspiration of a great and dedicated chairman, our committee has worked diligently to produce such a bill. Every member of the committee has made a large contribution. Our differences we have sought fairly to compromise. Thus I am giving my support to a bill with which I am not in every particular satisfied but which does represent the best approach to the solution of a very difficult and complex legislative problem that our committee could reach after days of public hearings and hours of earnest discussion.

I am especially pleased with one provision that resulted from a long conference had by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] and me with our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN], the author of the bill, and Dr. JUDD. This is the provision that sets January 1, 1951, as the shutoff date for inquiry into an applicant's past as regards membership in the Communist Party. This is an entirely new legislative concept in this field.

At an earlier period there were persons who joined the Communist Party as a gesture in idealism, just as there were many idealists who allied themselves with the Socialist Party some decades ago. They were loyal Americans, were in fact not knowing participants in a conspiracy against their country, its institutions, and its welfare. When they became aware of the purpose of an international conspiracy, they withdrew from the party. It is possible that even in 1948 some remained, still holding to what to them was a concept in idealism, still distributing the existence of an international conspiracy.

But then came Korea and everyone was on notice. So we have in this bill a new concept, based on something definite, the hostilities in Korea—January 1, 1951, as the shutoff date. All before that may be forgiven and forgotten. It is merely applying the principles of the statute of limitations which governs the period during which one can be indicted for a criminal act or proceeded against in a civil action.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, it is rather hard to go against the tide and the tide seems to favor this bill. I am one of those who feels that this bill if passed will just give us our labor for our pains, because the Supreme Court in the case of Kent against Dulles, decided in most emphatic language that the right to travel is not a mere privilege to be granted or withheld as a matter of grace, but that the right to travel is an inherent right, a constitutional right guaranteed by the fifth amendment. And since it is a right guaranteed by the fifth amendment it cannot be taken away from one, or one cannot be deprived of that right except by due process. And there is not due process in this bill as we know it from the case law.

For example, you still permit what is known as faceless accusers; that is, persons who bring charges against an applicant and the applicant need not know who the accuser may be.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman is a little bit wrong about that because, if he will read on page 3, lines 23 and 24 it says that this act shall be subject to judicial review on the record.

Mr. CELLER. What does "on the record" mean? The record is the record made by the Secretary of State. He can make the record very narrow, he can make it very wide. But the record would permit, as the bill is drafted, the so-called testimony of hooded, secret, faceless accusers. There is no right of confrontation, there is no right of cross-examination.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Your own great daily liberal newspaper from New York City, the New York Times, in its editorial yesterday said, and I will quote only one sentence in order to save time:

If the Secretary knows anything derogatory about the individual he will, therefore, have to trot it out.

Now, the committee means and intends by this language "on the record," and I had a good deal to do with putting this in, I think I am the author of it, that the record shall be complete and that the accused shall have the right to know who his accusers are, and he shall have the right to see the record on which the Secretary made his determination. If the Secretary refuses to produce that, it is the intent of the committee that the court shall order a passport granted forthwith.

Mr. CELLER. I will say to the gentleman he did not read all of that editorial in the New York Times. The New York Times did not give fulsome praise or fulsome approval to this bill. But beyond that there is nothing in this bill except the words "on the record" and what that can mean is very difficult to state because the language is very vague. It is anybody's guess. The Supreme Court went out of its way to state in order that there shall be due process the Court will very narrowly—not broadly—construe the statute. Since we have these so-called hooded denouncers and irresponsible rumor bearers and since there is no confrontation and no right of cross-examination and insofar as informers are usually wrong as to the identity of those whom they are accusing, and insofar as they are often misinformed and very likely are at times vicious and malicious—otherwise they would disclose their names—I cannot conceive how the Supreme Court demand that there is a due process is satisfied by this bill.

We seem to be legislating always because of fear. Fear of this fear that we seem to see ghosts everywhere. I am reminded of what Cervantes said in the dialog between Sancho and Don Quixote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me additional time? He promised to yield more time.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman—

The trouble is—

Sancho said to Don Quixote—

you are so afraid that you cannot see or hear properly; for one of the effects of fear is to disturb the senses, and cause things to appear other than what they are.

Indeed, our fear builds up walls to bar light and reason.

But how can we justify this situation? Here we welcome with open arms one of the worst of the Communists, a man who built up his power over the dead bodies of thousands and thousands of his victims. We invite Mr. Khrushchev here. We invited Koslov here. We invited Mikoyan here, and we even let them see our nuclear installations. Beyond that we have had Mr. Andrei Tupolev, the Soviet Union's leading aircraft designer, who was permitted to see the production line of the Thor intermediate range ballistic missile at Douglas Aircraft Co. in Santa Monica, Calif. How can you justify those actions? And then refuse to grant passports to Communists or fellow travelers going into Russia? I say that is grotesque. We should pause long before we pass such legislation.

I herewith insert my remarks before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on August 10, 1959:

Last year about this time I had the privilege of appearing before this committee on the very question which confronts you today: Should we have passport legislation, and, if so, what form should it take?

Last year I spoke in favor of a bill which I had introduced and which took the positive approach to this problem. Rather than restrict the travel of Americans, my position was that we should concern ourselves with assuring to our people the right to travel. Events of this past year have, I think, further justified my position. At a time when the three top Communists of the Soviet Union, Khrushchev, Mikoyan, and Koslov, have or will be given the red carpet tour of our country, is it not incongruous to restrict the travel of American citizens on the ground that they have leftist associations? At a time when Andrei Tupolev, the leading Russian designer of jet aircraft, is shown the assembly line of our Thor intermediate range ballistic missile, is it not anomalous to be so obsessed with security that we insist on legislation which will allow the security of the State to deny passports to an Arthur Miller or even a Paul Robeson?

Although I had profoundly hoped that this committee would act favorably upon my right-to-travel bill in the 95th Congress, the overwhelming vote in the House of Representatives approving the restrictive legislation endorsed by this committee convinced me that it would be unrealistic to expect favorable action on nonrestrictive legislation at this time. However, I believe that there is a middle ground on which the security conscious and the freedom conscious can meet. If what the security conscious are concerned with are certain activities against the United States abroad, then let us write legislation denying passports where there is a reasonable anticipation of certain defined activities rather than associations for the holding of opinions.

Unfortunately, however, most of the proposals before this committee would deny an American his right to travel not because of evidence that the applicant was about to commit an act with serious consequences to the national security, but rather on the basis of who are his friends, what he said in the past, and what some minor functionary concludes his beliefs were or are. Thus, a disposition to engage in any activity unfavorable to the United States would be sufficient cause for denial.

However, even among people who are so disposed there may be vital differences in their activities abroad. Some will criticize U.S. policy or praise Soviet policy or attend a peace conference, others will transmit secrets, and others will, in fact, do nothing disadvantageous to the United States. There obviously are significant qualitative differences among these activities. Under our system of constitutional guarantees, some activities may be made the subject of criminal law and prohibited, others clearly may not. Yet the standards which were followed by the State Department and are now proposed to be enacted seem to have completely disregarded this essential factor. I believe that a policy consistent with our traditions must predicate any denial of a passport upon evidence of the particular activity which the denial is intended to prevent.

While the impending activities of an individual cannot be predicted with mathematical certainty, it is entirely feasible to establish reasonable grounds on which to believe that a person is going abroad to commit a certain act. Let us assume that an individual is shown to have had access to important classified material, that he had during recent years been active in the Communist Party, that he has recently been in contact with Red agents in this country, that he has booked passage for Europe. Proof beyond reasonable doubt adequate for a criminal conviction, no. But reasonable grounds to believe that he is going abroad to transmit secrets, yes.

Still, it is argued that our national security will be jeopardized in those cases which are difficult to prove. I submit that the danger to our national security which would result from the travel of most fellow travelers and even most Communists has been vastly exaggerated. It certainly has no relevance to those who have been unjustifiably denied passports under the broad standards and unreliable factfinding procedures which have characterized the passport program.

The professional and really effective spies like Colonel Abel obviously do not have to rely on Miss Frances Knight's good graces to enter or leave the United States. A nation that can launch a sputnik and a lunik is capable of providing false papers to its agents. Furthermore, it is patently ridiculous to believe that vital secrets once obtained can be retained within the borders of the United States even by denying passports to everyone who wears or has worn a red carnation. Iron Curtain diplomats come and go freely. Diplomatic pouches are sent back and forth from Washington to Moscow without interference or search. Americans who are denied passports may still travel to a number of countries in the Western Hemisphere without passports and there meet Red couriers or officials.

What, then, do we accomplish by restrictive legislation of the kind that is generally being proposed? In the main, we deny exit to people who, because of current attitudes or past associations, may provide favorable propaganda abroad for the Soviet Union. Again, I say this is patently unrealistic. Communist sympathizers need not leave the United States to accomplish a propaganda purpose. Tape recordings and films made here and transported abroad, statements made here which are reported abroad, releases to the foreign Communist press are all available and effective means of communication. And how much greater is the propaganda value when there is appended a brief editorial comment that the writer has been confined within the United States because of his disagreement with the official attitude of the U.S. Government? For then we have an indictment of the United States, not by the misrepresentations of some fellow traveler, but more damningly by the repressive action of the U.S. Government itself. Considered in the context of our commitment to a program of free travel and our condemnation of the Russians for prohibiting travel by those who disagree with the Marxist line, the effect on our international stature of restrictions of this kind can only be most injurious. Our security slip is showing.

A graphic illustration of what I am talking about is the Paul Robeson case. As long as he could not get a passport, Robeson's restriction made good propaganda. Since he has gotten a passport, the Reds have lost an effective argument which appealed to millions around the world. Robeson has been abroad since last summer. During that time he made a concert appearance in Moscow in which he exhibited warm friendship for the Soviet Union and called upon the Russian people to fight for freedom. What freedom or whose he did not specify.

Has the strength of this Nation so deteriorated that we feel threatened by a performance of this sort?

Another example of how foolish we have made ourselves appear to the rest of the world, and for no good reason, is the Arthur Miller case. In 1954, the Pultizer Prize winning author of "Death of a Salesman" was not allowed to go to Brussels to see a performance of his own play, "The Crucible." Finally, in June 1955, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upset the State Department's denial of the passport because it was based on insufficient reasons. Mr. Miller subsequently went to Europe and the foundations of the Republic have not crumbled. Actions like this have brought us uncomfortably close to what the free world found so outrageous in the Russian treatment of Boris Pasternak.

I do not say that the right to travel is absolute, that no limitations can be justified. Clearly, in time of war, the President should and must be free to issue almost any travel regulation he considers necessary. But what about periods when the President or Congress has determined that although we are not at war the Nation is nevertheless beset by great dangers—a period of national emergency? If this committee deems that legislation is necessary, then I think that the interests of national security and individual freedom can be best accommodated by legislation which would permit the denial of a passport in periods of national emergency when the Secretary of State finds reasonable grounds to believe that the applicant will commit either of the following acts while abroad:

1. Transmit secrets affecting the national security;

2. Incite attacks by force upon the United States or attempt to overthrow its Government by force and violence.

These acts are punishable as crimes if committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. It would seem that society should have the right to protect itself from acts against it abroad if it has the right to protect itself from the same acts committed within its jurisdiction.

I would, therefore, support legislation authorizing these acts as grounds for the denial of passports provided that proper procedural safeguards are incorporated in the legislation.

Because of the significance of the right at stake, a passport should not be denied without a full trial-type administrative hearing. The applicant should be given prompt notice of any tentative denial of his application. The notice should inform him of the reasons for denial in sufficient detail that he can explain or refute them. He must have a hearing before an impartial tribunal with a right to appear and to be represented by counsel. The Government should be required to present its evidence on the record and to confront the applicant with the witnesses against him. The administrative board should be required to make a reasonable decision on the record and subject to judicial review.

While the State Department is willing to provide all the other elements of a trial-type hearing, it insists that considerations of national security often preclude it from (1) explaining the reasons for denial in detail, (2) disclosing certain evidence to the applicant, and (3) confronting the applicant with the witnesses against him. To do so, argues the Department, would be to reveal vital information about our counterintelligence and espionage systems which would inevitably destroy our sources of information.

That there is some merit to this argument, cannot be denied. However, balanced against it are the risks of unjustifiably depriving a citizen of his constitutional right to travel. As any trial lawyer will tell you, the disclosure of evidence and the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses are indispensable to arriving at the truth. Informers make mistakes in identification. They are sometimes maliciously motivated. Investigators have been known to be slipshod in their methods and conclusions. Lies, half-truths, unjustifiable conclusions which would go unchallenged in secret proceedings, usually break down under the tests of effective questioning. For these reasons, the courts have held that in criminal cases the Government must reveal its evidence and confront a defendant with the witnesses against him or it must let him go free.

While the deprivation of liberty consequent upon a criminal prosecution may be more onerous, still the deprivation of a particular individual's right to travel may result in serious hardships and indignities. It is a right of sufficient importance so that the risk of its unjust deprivation is far more serious to our way of life than the risk that an occasional effective enemy may receive official approval to leave the United States.

Up to now I have been discussing restraints upon individuals. There is, however, another facet to the problem: the question of geographical or area restrictions affecting all American travelers.

Unlike the issue of individual restraints, the question of the extent of the Secretary's power to impose area restrictions has not been ruled on by the Supreme Court although this issue is involved in current litigation. It would appear, however, that since the Executive has exclusive power in the field of international relations, the Secretary would have broad discretion in applying area restrictions as an instrument of foreign policy.

This is not to say that what the Secretary can do he has done well or will do wisely. During the past few years the State Department has seemingly forgotten that in addition to foreign policy, other vital interests are affected when Americans are barred from foreign lands; among them is the need to know what is going on.

Curiosity is not the only thing at stake, although the value of that disappearing virtue is too frequently understimated. What is ultimately at stake is the vitality of the democratic process in reacting to the issues which confront it. Intelligent decisions by the electorate require facts, not solely as presented in official statements, but as observed by individuals and by trained reporters.

I do not say that there can be no reason for the imposition of area restrictions. Situations have arisen and will arise where the presence of large numbers of American nationals may substantially increase the likelihood of our involvement in hostilities. In that case a convincing argument can be made for putting the area off limits. But how, then, do we justify the prohibitions on travel which the State Department imposed on Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and Syria in 1956, 2 days after all parties to the hostilities had formally agreed to a cease-fire? A prohibition which continued until April 1, 1957, a period during which no other country found that the safety of its nationals required such a restriction, and I include Great Britain and France, two of the belligerents.

Were the decision mine, I would impose area restrictions only where the presence of American nationals is likely to result either in abuses to them which would severely embarrass American prestige or where the presence of our nationals is likely to bring us into armed conflict.

The suggestion of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York that the Secretary of State "accompany the imposition of area restrictions with a full statement setting forth the reasons therefor" is a desirable advance. The prospect of exposure to critics whose names do not appear on the routing slips in Foggy Bottom may produce a less mechanistic application of standards which of necessity leaves much to the judgment of the Secretary of State.

It is only with sadness that I find that the ideal of complete freedom of travel cannot now be realized. But just as we must recognize that reality, we must also recognize that we have during the past decade gone too far in abridging that right. The Supreme Court's decision in the Rockwell Kent case has had the happy effect of generating a widespread reevaluation of our past policies. The challenge and the opportunity for a statesmanlike solution lies with the 86th Congress.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield to the gentleman from New York or anyone else in this body in my desire to defend people from faceless accusers. That is why we have assiduously worked to write protective language into this bill to prevent that kind of thing from happening.

It is true I did not read the entire editorial from the New York Times. I did not mean to mislead anybody. I certainly admit that the editorial does not wholeheartedly endorse nor oppose this bill. But I was trying to point out, with reference to the particular issue the gentleman was making, that the person is entitled to a judicial review—if I can read the English language and can interpret it correctly, the New York Times says he is guaranteed that right. Here is what it says completely on that point:

In all cases the unsuccessful applicant for a passport would be guaranteed a hearing and would be entitled to judicial review on the record. If the Secretary knows anything derogatory about the individual he will therefore have to trot it out. Nobody can be denied the right to see Paris or Rome or spend a summer in Majorca just because somebody has whispered unflattering words into the ear of the Secretary of State or one of his subordinates.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I will say that the gentleman's own bill was a fair bill and I would wholeheartedly approve it because it in so many words said that there would be hearings in unequivocal language, but I failed to see anything of that sort in this bill.

Mr. HAYS. Let me say to the gentleman I tried to get that spelled out in an amendment but I was unsuccessful.

Being the realist that I am, I did the best I could, and I am frank to say I think this law needs modification because you yourself said that the Court said it was intended to take a very narrow view of this, and I interpret that as meaning that in the vernacular used in my district, you have got to put up or shut up. We say that if the Court is not satisfied that the evidence adduced is sufficient that they shall order that the man be granted a passport.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. COFFIN. May I verify what the gentleman said; and I refer to the hearings, pages 11, 49, 77, and 101. This same point of view was expressed, namely, that the State Department when challenged would have to divulge all of its information or none. If it did not want to divulge all of its information then it would have to issue a passport. This is a very vital feature of the judicial review.

Mr. HAYS. As a matter of fact, the gentleman will recall that the people from the State Department were opposed to this. Then they said that if we would strike out these three words they would like the bill. They did not like any part of going on the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me an additional minute?

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. HAYS. I would point out that last year in the hearings I asked with reference to this bill we are now considering whether under the language of the bill the Department could withhold a passport from a Member of Congress. The representative said "We would not be that irresponsible." I said: "Never mind that; could you do it?" And he said, "Yes, we could."

We put in language to take care of that. We have tried to surround this bill with all the safeguards possible.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYS. I would not be down here supporting the bill if I did not think it contained every safeguard that could be written in it that the courts of this country could consider.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASEM. Title 2 provides that the President may restrict travel of individuals when it would seriously impair the foreign relations, or when the United States could not adequately provide protection. I see no provision for judicial review.

Mr. HAYS. May I say to the gentleman that that is quite an involved question. I do not desire not to answer it, but my minute is almost up. I hope when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule I will have time to answer the gentleman fully.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. POFF].

Mr. POFF. Mr. Chairman, with due deference to the opinion expressed by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, it seems to me clear that there can be no reasonable doubt that the bill, so carefully drawn, affords due process of law as we have understood it in this country for generations.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the bill is constitutional, and there can be no reasonable doubt that the sovereign has the power to protect itself against a member of a seditious conspiracy by restricting his movements even, if necessary, by depriving him of his entire liberty by incarceration.

I strongly favor this bill and would like to use the remainder of my time to inquire of a member of the committee as to the prospects of this bill in the other body at this session.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POFF. I yield.

Mr. ADAIR. There is legislation pending in the other body. Informally we learn that the prospects for action on it at this session are not very bright.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POFF. I yield.

Mr. HAYS. The fact is that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate announced that they would not have time to consider it at this session.

Mr. POFF. I consider that most regrettable.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHERER].

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Chairman, I think the best way we can demonstrate the absolute need for this legislation is for me to review one or two cases of the many that have been developed before the House Committee on Un-American Activities with reference to the abuse of the use of passports. Take the case of Jane and George Zlatovski. George was a Russian before he became a naturalized American citizen. They made application for a passport. The State Department denied it. Why did they deny it? Simply because at that time the intelligence agents of this country were engaged in the investigation of one of the greatest espionage rings involving the selling of defense secrets.

Jane and George Zlatovski were involved in the investigation. The State Department denied them a passport, but the investigation was not complete. The Court came along and said that the State Department had to give them the passport.

Jane and George Zlatovski were given a passport. They traveled all over the world, and a year later they were indicted along with the notorious Colonel Abel for espionage and sabotage in this country.

Jane and George Zlatovski are today at large some place in the world and this country is not able to bring them to trial.

Then there is the case of Louis Wheaton, a graduate of one of our top law schools in this country. Wheaton made application for a passport so he could get a master's degree at Geneva University. He committed perjury in making his application for passport. He said he was going to Geneva University in Switzerland but instead he went to attend a phony peace conference in Peiping. There he broadcast over the Peiping radio. His testimony was monitored by the State Department. He attacked the United States and said that in the Korean war our boys had waged bacteriological warfare.

He certainly inflamed the minds of the people of Asia against the United States by these and other statements he made. They were monitored by the State Department. He said he had seen in the Korean war where American boys had taken Chinese women and put them in a barn, taken their children and put them across the road in another house, poured gasoline on the house, set fire to it, and then machinegunned the Chinese women as they rushed to their children.

That man got a passport through fraud. That is what we are trying to stop by this bill. We caught up with him; that is, the Committee on Un-American Activities, when this fellow was back in California lecturing for peace and preaching the Communist line to the mothers of the very boys he had accused of these atrocities.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. SCHERER. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Does this bill stop such people as Paul Robeson from running all over Russia talking against the United States?

Mr. SCHERER. This would put a stop to it. He was another witness who appeared before our committee. I would like to tell you some of the things that Paul Robeson said about the United States of America while he was traveling in Europe on a U.S. passport.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Tell us about the insolence that he displayed before your committee and the insolence to you.

Mr. SCHERER. He was the most insolent, arrogant witness I have ever seen during my term as a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

I happen to have Robeson's testimony, or some of his testimony, here. This is what he said while in Russia:

> It is unthinkable that the Negro people of America or elsewhere in the world could be drawn into war with the Soviet Union. If the American warmongers fancy that they could win America's millions of Negroes for a war against the Soviet Union and the peoples' democracies, then they ought to understand that this will never be the case. Why should the Negroes ever fight againt the only nation of the world where racial discrimination is prohibited, where the people can live freely? Never.
> Moscow is very dear to me, and very close to my heart. I want to emphasize again that only here in the Soviet Union did I feel that I was a real man with a capital "M."

Then he goes on into another tirade and bitter attack on the United States.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. That is the kind of man that the gentleman from New York says should have the unrestricted right to travel everywhere in the world?

Mr. SCHERER. I cannot speak for the gentleman from New York, but certainly this gentleman from Ohio is opposed to allowing these individuals to travel freely all over the world attacking the United States and its foreign policy .

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, in considering this bill we must think a little bit about intent. I would like to say that Mr. Hanes, security officer of the State Department, has said, and I quote from the National Tribune, a veterans' paper:

> Hanes urged Congress to kill the whole program unless it is willing to let the Department base passport denials on information from counterespionage agents and other confidential sources if this is deemed necessary. "We would rather have no bill at all," he said, "than one that would require the unmasking of undercover people."

If that is the intent of the State Department, we can see that regardless of what we write here, if the language is as vague and as indefinite as this language is, how the State Department is going to interpret it.

This brings up the vital point. Those of us who are going to object to this rule or semblance of a rule find out in justice now that our speakers against the bill, probably three of them, are going to end up with about 10 minutes out the 60 minutes. This is another example of the justice which we can expect because somewhere along the line we are outmaneuvered and never get a fair chance to present the opposing testimony, and neither will the people who want a passport get the chance. Sure, we can approve the bill in the committee, but what will happen in its implementation?

The State Department wanted to take off the whole head and the neck of liberty, but we were successful in compromising, so now they are only going to take off the top part of the head. Nevertheless, the brain is being taken out in the process. I admit that the committee tried to do a good job, but with this kind of legislation it is almost impossible to do a proper job and safeguard the liberties of Americans. Sure, we want to get at the Communists, at the saboteurs, but I say to you the best way to get at them is through existing law. Enforce the existing law. We have a good FBI department. If the men are guilty, let us get hold of them, but let us not give the State Department another chance to ruin innocent people by making accusations and then, if they want to, withdraw their accusations and not present their testimony, because that is possible under this bill. They could make their accusations and then withdraw them and not present their witnesses or their testimony on the record.

A further thing that they can do, is injure people by temporary denial of their right to travel and putting them to the expense of protecting their own rights. And, that is all right, if you are getting someone who is guilty, but it is not all right if you are getting an innocent, good American citizen. Now, you may say to me that this is not going to happen. But, I say to you that our State Department is on record for what they have done in the past and they are going to do exactly this. And, I say that the careless wording in the bill will speak for itself; not that our committee was careless. Our committee was very careful, but in the heat and the confusion of discussion and debate, in the markup, with the time running out and the urge to bring this up under suspension of the rules at the last moment, we see the price of improper consideration. And, I would say that our committee report itself says that this subject has not been considered thoroughly enough to present a comprehensive passport bill. I plead with you to reject this bill until such time as our committee can present a thorough, comprehensive bill.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out—the gentleman from Vermont would not yield to me—that it is not the State Department who interprets the intent of a law, and if the people who are so worried about protecting the rights of individuals would quit cluttering up the RECORD with what the intent of Congress is, and let us point out that the intent of the Congress is to give the people who apply for this every safeguard, that is the record the courts are going to read. They are going to try to find out what the intent of the Congress is. If I thought Mr. Hanes' position were as sound as he is sincere I would not try to amend this bill. I am trying to write a bill that will protect people from the Haneses and people like that and give them the rights in the courts of the United States that have been traditionally theirs. And, it is going to be the record written here that the courts are going to look at to find out what the intent is. They do not care what the intent of the State Department is, because the State Department does not write the law .

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I would like to show where the State Department has done this.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to address myself today to a proposal which would grant legislative authority to the Secretary of State to deny passports to Communists and known sympathizers.

If ever there was a time in our history when we should take positive steps to close the loopholes in our national security network, that time is now. Should we doubt the wisdom of this statement, we have only to look to the impasse reached around the conference table at Geneva. The Communists have time and time again displayed an unwillingness to honorably negotiate the momentous issues facing the world today. Their leader has publicly promised to "bury" us. This signal warning should serve to stir even the most complacement and apathetic into concerted action aimed at self-protection and preservation.

Since the passage of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, the effectiveness of the efforts of agencies entrusted with our national security has been lessened in many instances by adverse decisions of our highest Court. This has been due in part to the absence of a clear legislative mandate in some of the fields in which the Government has sought to operate. For the most part, however, these decisions seem to reflect a reluctance on the part of the Court to strike a balance between the rights of the individual on one hand and the dictates of our national well-being on the other. While this balance is admittedly very delicate, it does not require a stretch of the imagination to envision a political system in which all individual rights are subverted to those of the state.

Realizing that these decisions have had the effect of seriously hampering our efforts toward self-protection, the American Bar Association recommended certain proposals designed to offset their effect. The measure under discussion today is intended to implement one of those recommendations.

Historically speaking, the Secretary of State has always been empowered to refuse passports to persons whose presence abroad might adversely affect our foreign policy or endanger our national security. These determinations, however, have not been based on statutory provisions. Thus, the Supreme Court decided recently that the Secretary of State could not legally deny passports to Communists or Communist sympathizers. This decision resulted in passport applications from almost 400 people believed to come under the category denied passports under the proposed legislation. We need to give legislative recognition to the Secretary of State in his fight to see that our foreign policy does not suffer. World domination, the ultimate aim of communism, is dependent on free and unrestricted travel of its advocates, whether they be American or otherwise. To permit these people such an opportunity is to permit them to broadcast their distortions and untruths about our way of life while at the same time affording them the protection of the very Government they are attempting to undermine.

There is nothing arbitrary or capricious involved here. Provision is made for a full administrative hearing which requires that the Secretary of State show cause why a passport should be denied. Nor is it a question of denying the right of an individual to entertain unorthodox political, economic or social views so long as these views do not endanger our security. What is involved, however, is whether our democratic ideals and institutions will be able to withstand the assaults leveled against them from within and without if we do not take steps to substantially strengthen and protect them.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the House will look favorably on this proposal.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Chairman, I believe this legislation is urgently needed and I strongly favor it.

My reasons can best be given by repeating portions of my testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in support of my own bill H.R. 5575.

Mr. Chairman, I consider the enactment of this legislation to be a matter of urgency. Since the Supreme Court decision of June 16, 1958, it is well known that applications for passports by persons engaged in Communist activity have increased greatly. The late Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and President Eisenhower have stated many times that such travel is not in the best interest of the U.S. Government.

It is well known that a favorite device of persons dedicated to overthrowing our system of government is to send agents abroad who can bring back instructions from international communism through the courier system. These agents also carry American funds abroad to be used in the financing of the international Communist movement. Certainly it is in the best interest of our way of life and our system of government that such travel be restricted.

Technically, freedom to leave the continental limits of the United States is a right of every citizen. But, leaving with a passport and the protection of the U.S. Government is a privilege.

I realize from the discussion that has taken place here this morning, this is probably the crux of the entire matter.

I don't agree with the statement which has been made here this morning that a passport is nothing more than an exit permit. Practically, I think we will all agree, it is used primarily as a travel document.

We all know that it is necessary at any point of entry to present your passport and without such travel document it is not possible to gain entry to that particular country.

Now, I'd like to raise this point: If the receipt of a passport is a right—if the right to travel is a constitutional right—why then do we issue passports at all? It obviously is something more than a right of exit. We know that its practical use is for other purposes. If it was solely for a right of exit, why then should we bother to issue them at all and set up any regulations concerning them?

Now, I contend that this right to receive this travel document which carries with it certain privileges is a privilege which is bestowed at the discretion of the executive branch of the Government.

This committee, I know, has had numerous hearings with respect to the status of forces treaties. Now, I, for one, have always defended those treaties, but in them we have a situation where American citizens are denied their constitutional rights as U.S. citizens because they are in a foreign country. They are denied the rights of habeas corpus, trial by jury and numerous others.

I bring this up merely to make the point that I believe the existence of the status of forces treaty, having been ratified by the Senate, clearly shows that all of your constitutional rights do not go with you when you are in a foreign country. I think the same point can be made with respect to the right to travel. That if you have the right to leave this country which no one denies—certainly I do not—you do not carry with you into a foreign country all of the rights that you might have in this country.

One other point I would like to make in this respect: It has been said here in this hearing this morning that reentry into this country is a right. Yet I think it is pretty generally accepted that if a person leaves this country and returns he must prove upon his return that he has been inoculated against certain diseases. If he has not been inoculated, then it is my understanding that we can require that he be inoculated before he has the complete and absolute right of reentry.

I raise that point to make another. If the reentry right—and I assume you call it a constitutional right—can be restricted with conditions which are in the general public interest—namely, inoculation against communicable disease—then why can't the exit right be restricted in the same public interest?

To conclude my statement, it is traditional that privileges are only granted to those citizens who conduct themselves in a manner which is in the best interests of the greatest number of people. It is not offensive to our basic beliefs in liberty and freedom when the privilege of freedom is denied a murderer or other persons guilty of committing a crime against society. Since the activity of Communists is not in the best interests of society in general, I think it only proper that the privilege of receiving a passport should be denied them.

Liberty and personal freedom are things which I am very jealous about. However, I believe my liberty and freedom is the direct result of our system of free democratic government. If Communists have their way, that system of government will be abolished and with it will go my freedoms and personal liberty. It is only proper that those who would seek to restrict our constitutional liberties by overthrowing the Government which guarantees them should be restricted in the accomplishment of their avowed purpose.

I strongly urge your committee to take favorable action on some legislation restricting the passport privilege.

Mr. Chairman, for the same reasons as I presented to the committee I urge passage of this bill.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RILEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9069) to provide standards for the issuance of passports, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill H.R. 9069.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Will this legislation be the first order of business tomorrow, or is the Speaker prepared to say?

The SPEAKER. No; I do not think so.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8609. An act to amend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, as amended, by extending the authorities of titles I and II, strengthening the program of disposals through barter, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists on its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, and Mr. HICKENLOOPER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill H.R. 8609, "to amend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, as amended, by extending the authorities of titles I and II, strengthening the program of disposals through barter, and for other purposes," with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree with the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. GRANT, GATHINGS, ALBERT, THOMPSON of Texas, HOEVEN, BELCHER, and MCINTIRE.

CITATION BY MISSOURI FARMERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], I ask unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD to include a citation by the Missouri Farmers Association for distinguished service to agriculture by Senator SYMINGTON, of Missouri, and his response.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

IRRESPONSIBLE SPENDING IN OUR RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, irresponsible spending in our Rivers and Harbors appropriations bill—often known as the pork barrel bill—can not only injure the financial stability of our country, but unless we use common sense and restraint, this irresponsible spending will eventually wreck the very rivers and harbors program it purports to expedite.

Every Congressman justifiably wants needed improvements in the waterways of his locality, but we must proceed in an orderly and fair manner and not proceed like a gang of kids in a candy store. We cannot commence every project at this time that may ever be worthy.

When I came to Congress about 9 years ago, Indiana was participating but sparingly in our Federal public works program.

Our State had, however, organized the Indiana Flood Control and Water Resources Commission to study and work out a sensible long-range solution of our flood control problem and the equally important problem of utilization and improvement of our water resources. We are working out a long-range coordinated plan for that solution with our State engineers in cooperation with the U.S. Corps of Engineers. I have worked closely with my State and with the Corps of Engineers on these Indiana projects. Every Indiana project in this year's public works bill had been studied and approved by the Indiana Flood Control and Water Resources Commission, by the U.S. Corps of Engineers and by the Bureau of the Budget. I believe that Indiana Senators and Congressmen are justified in asking every other State to follow the same fiscal responsibility in regard to their projects.

It is also a fact, Mr. Speaker, that Indiana has the only project in this bill in which the State is contributing more than is the Federal Government. When this bill came before the House earlier this year, I worked and voted to limit the bill to those properly engineering projects that were in the budget. We failed, however, in this worthwhile attempt and 67 unapproved projects were ultimately included. It is interesting that on the whole those States which succeeded in adding unapproved projects to the bill are also getting a lion's share of projects on which the Corps of Engineers is already working.

A certain way to wreck the entire Federal flood control program, and with it Indiana's properly engineered and approved projects, is to load the bill each year with unapproved costly projects. Fiscal irresponsibility will wreck any program, and that includes our flood control program.

One relatively small but interesting project in the bill is for $500,000 to control water lilies in the Louisiana rivers. That project was inserted in the bill on the floor by a one-vote majority.

The cost for this 1 year on the 67 unapproved projects is not a large sum but by the time these projects are finished it will cost the American taxpayers $800 million, which is approximately the present average personal tax paid by a million families for 1 year.

The President vetoed this bill and we sustained his veto by only one vote. The rollcall vote was 274 to override the President's veto to 138 to sustain it. It takes a two-thirds majority to override a veto. In other words, 274 voted for these unauthorized projects and only 138 of us voted against them. Frankly, we are outnumbered about 2 to 1. I doubt that we will be able to hold the line much longer, but I insist that we must realize it is the taxpayers' money we are spending. Unless we balance the budget, this money must be paid for by our children and our children's children.

The situation reminds me of a story where a father and son were on a ship. The ship hit a rock and commenced to sink. The son ran to his father and said: "Father, father, the ship is sinking." The father smiled and said, "Why should we worry, son, we don't own the ship." However, Mr. Speaker, all America is on the ship in this case, and every American owns a share of it, to boot.

VISIT OF MR. NIKITA KHRUSHCHEV

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been gravely concerned over the impending visit of Nikita Khrushchev and of the behavior of American citizens at that time.

Few if any of us approve of godless, atheistic communism or the behavior of the Government of Soviet Russia, either under Mr. Stalin, Mr. Malenkov, or Mr. Khrushchev; nevertheless, Soviet Russia is one of the most powerful governments and political forces in the world today, and on our behavior, individually and collectively, may hinge the future relationship of his nation and ours. Although I was not in favor of extending an invitation to Mr. Khrushchev to visit the United States, he is now coming as the invited head of a government recognized by the United States and with whom the United States has at least the fiction of friendly relations.

We need not delude ourselves that the millennium is upon us from either the visit of Mr. Khrushchev to the United States or that of our own President and Vice President to the Soviet Union.

However, these exchanges coupled with other changes in Soviet-American relations can result in an opportunity to establish a real peace and mean certain changes in the cold war are already accomplished. Mr. Khrushchev comes as the guest of the United States and is entitled to the traditional hospitality given to a guest in the home. It is imperative that he be received with courtesy. Although Americans need not forgo their traditional right of free speech and expression, it should be exercised without hostility and disrespect.

In view of the history of half-truth, distortion, and outright falsehood that has clouded every phase of Soviet Russia's teaching of history and dissemination of information, we can expect that Mr. Khrushchev comes to the United States with certain delusions about warmongering, suffering, and oppression of the individual, in keeping with the basic Marxist doctrine on America and a free capitalistic economy.

These delusions can be in part dispelled by his visit when he observes the number of homes and automobiles belonging to ordinary Americans, a thing unheard of in Russia, and the prosperity and wordlyy possessions available to all over here. Mr. Khrushchev must be allowed every opportunity to see the freedom and historic self-determination of the American people of their city, State, and Federal Governments. If he is afforded proper opportunity, there is much else Mr. Khruschev can and will learn which will have a beneficial effect on his future attitude. Mr. Khruschev can learn that we are a peace-loving people, anxious to live at peace in the world, but willing and able to fight if forced to preserve our independence and freedom and our American way of life. Mr. Khrushchev can observe our strength in our industries, our wealth of raw materials, our military, technical and scientific ability as well as the will, skill and determination of our people, our richest resource.

We must also remember that World War I began with postol shots and assassination of a head of state. A bitterly hostile press and people, even in a small local minority, causing a few isolated instances of hooliganism like egg or tomato throwing can do much to destroy any favorable impression of Mr. Khruschev. Indeed, such a reception would send Mr. Khruschev home bitter and alienated far beyond his present disposition toward the United States. Certainly our own Vice President received a gracious reception in the Soviet Union, and America must not be shamed in its own hospitality by comparison.

Our welcome must even be such that Mr. Khruschev be invited to address a joint session of Congress, if in session, as are all other visiting heads of State.

Mr. Khruschev's visit does not mean a termination of the cold war nor that we are embarking on an era of peace which can be a golden age for humanity.

America must not let down its guard as a result of one visit. We must, at the same time, assure our allies that we are not engaging in any two-party diplomacy and negotiations to their exclusion by selling our friends and allies, as well as the people behind the Iron Curtain, down the river because, during, or as a result of, Mr. Khrushchev's visit. If America uses this visit wisely and if Americans everywhere will act with dignity and maturity this visit may yet have far reaching influences for good for all people.

LABOR UNIONS FORTRESS OF DEMOCRACY

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, today is Labor Day. I rise to pay tribute to millions of loyal Americans, and to the leaders and members of the great American labor union movement. For it is only because of the persistent, imaginative efforts of labor unions that the working men and women of this country have achieved the highest standard of living of any nation in the world.

As we turn back the pages of history, we recall the dark days of exploitation and strife, the company plug-uglies and private detective forces armed with shotguns to mow down those workingmen with the courage to ask for a living wage. That was a sorry chapter in the economic history of our land, just as the infiltration of cheap crooks and racketeers into some unions is something which shames us all.

Faced with the determined and armed opposition of shortsighted owners, labor union members stuck to their principles and succeeded in welding unions which made major contributions to the welfare of the country. I believe that one of the outstanding reasons for the success of the labor union movement has been that its leaders and members have raised their sights above mere bread and butter issues, and have worked for the betterment of the nation's welfare. Better schools, housing, health, social security, conservation, and development of natural resources—all of these issues have found the labor unions unselfishly in the forefront of the fight.

Labor unions in recent months have been going through a very difficult period. The racketeers and hoodlums who have wormed their way into high places in some unions, and then blackened the reputation of the labor union movement, should be mercilessly cleaned out. There is some evidence that businessmen, through so-called "sweetheart" contracts, have encouraged crooked elements in labor unions in order to weaken the power and reputation of the union movement in the eyes of the public. There is also some evidence that lax law enforcement has failed to net and imprison these racketeers, and honest unions have paid for this duplicity.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken a firm position from the start against these elements in the labor union movement, and it is to the high credit of the AFL–CIO that that great organization has bent every effort to clean its own house. It has cost the AFL–CIO annual dues of $800,000 to kick out the Teamsters Union. I am proud to join with millions of honest labor union members and their leaders in denouncing these elements which have besmirched the fair name of American labor unionism.

I hasten to point out, Mr. Speaker, that those who would use this crisis in labor to try and thwart or cripple the labor union movement are making a terrible mistake. We seek to eliminate dishonesty, not to eliminate labor. Yes, I voted for the labor reform legislation, but I do not propose to be a party to having it used as a jagged sword to be plunged into labor's jugular vein. If the law is interpreted fairly, it can help protect the individual union member and wind up making the labor union movement stronger as it rids itself of corrupt elements.

West Virginia has a great labor union movement, Mr. Speaker. It was conceived in the blood and violence of the mine wars, but it has grown to maturity under wise leadership. I believe that the West Virginia Labor Federation is one of the most forthright and decent to be found anywhere. Under the leadership of its sincere and high-principled young president, Miles C. Stanley, the West Virginia Labor Federation is a growing force for the betterment of the State.

I would like to pay tribute also to the thousands of railroad workers in West Virginia, through whose brotherhoods so much economic progress has been made. And I salute the United Mine Workers on this Labor Day for the gains they have brought to the Mountain State.

We need only look at the tremendous advance in our standard of living since the end of World War II, then look into the dynamic forces which impelled this upward surge, and we shall find inevitably that the labor unions—with their steady insistence on economic betterment—are the propelling force. I challenge you to find a single group which has done more in a practical way to fight communism by clearing the Communists out of its ranks and by practicing the principles of constructive Americanism than the labor unions.

It is fitting on Labor Day 1959 that we recall again those wise words of Abraham Lincoln in his first annual message to Congress 98 years ago when he said: "Labor is prior to, and independent of, capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed." Those who would write off the labor union movement, and those who would start preparing funeral orations for the labor union movement had better pay heed to the words of Lincoln. For I believe that with the help of this new legislation when the unsavory elements are cleaned out of labor, we will find labor on the threshold of great new advances for the benefit of all mankind.

I cannot let this occasion pass, Mr. Speaker, without calling attention to the systematic efforts on the part of some newspapers to blacken labor's reputation. If a banker embezzles a million dollars, this is inside-page news and does not stir the editor to raise a hue and cry against all bankers. But uncover a cheap crook in a labor union, and it is front-page news and soon the editor is whipping up hysteria against the whole labor union movement. I am not minimizing in the least the crookedness which has been turned up by the McClellan committee, but I believe we should place it in perspective and give the labor unions their just due for the persistent efforts they have made to clean their own house.

At this point, I would like to quote the special counsel of the McClellan committee, Robert F. Kennedy, who filmed for West Virginia television an interview with three high school students who worked for a week in my office this summer. One of the students asked Mr. Kennedy whether there was more corruption in labor than in management, and he answered:

> We found wrongdoing in management and in members of bar associations. And I might say to you that the only group that's taken any action to try and clean up their problems has been the AFL–CIO which has dealt with corruption within their midst. No bar association has taken action against lawyers that have been found to act improperly and I don't know of any management group that's taken any action.

I believe the above statement by the able young counsel of the McClellan committee is highly significant. It underlines the fact that the labor union movement, contrary to the impression some newspapers are trying to create, has indeed taken the lead in cleaning its own house.

Mr. Speaker, I am very proud today to add my tribute to those of many others who recognize the power and force for good represented by the American labor union movement. I will fight shoulder to shoulder with the American workingman to help him improve his lot through labor unions, and thus further the welfare of all mankind.

A TABLE OF FABLES ON THE BACK PAGE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on the back page of the daily RECORD for the past week and a half has appeared a table of fables I presume prepared to bamboozle the public into a false idea of congressional savings.

The side-door arithmetic slyly slips by more than a billion and a half—$1,683,900,000—worth of failure to provide revenues and built-in spending that the President did not request for things like public housing, agricultural conservation, and veterans' pensions. I shall place a table in the RECORD documenting this item.

Furthermore, table I is incomplete and inaccurate and this year charges against the President deferments Congress made last year. I shall supply a correct table I for the RECORD.

In the August 28 RECORD, the gimmicks in table II juggle unlike figures into a $930 million error and blithely claim Congress decreased the President's requests for new obligational authority by $324 million. Actually, Congress increased these requests by $606 million.

Fruit basket mathematics is used to add apples and oranges to produce pineapples. The cost of the President's 4-year airport program is illogically compared with congressional action on the first 2 years, with no mention of deferred action on the other 2 years.

The tipsy tables ridiculously say that the $1,300 million in new obligations of the first vetoed $2.2 billion housing bill would have cut the President's request of $800 million for the comparable 2-year period. In the September 4 RECORD, the second housing bill is juggled into claiming that it—a vetoed bill—would have cut the President's request by over $825 million. So, the President's request was cut by more than he even requested in the first place.

There is a time and place for a bit of the ridiculous. But, this weary and wandering Congress does not have the time, and the back of the official RECORD is definitely not the place.

I vigorously object to this practice and will continue, along with the help of my colleagues, to spell out in greater detail the tricks of the tables. If the opposition believes in this kind of arithmetic, let them defend it in the debate on the floor of the House and Senate, but surely the back page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is no place for phony political propaganda.

LABOR DAY

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, to the schoolboy Labor Day means the point of no return. It closes the gate on the carefree days of summer, and leads him into the disciplined effort of the classroom. His labors begin.

For the housewife it is a day of liberation. Quiet settles over the neighborhood. She no longer has to put up with the shrill voices of children asking for this or that or to worry about what mischief they may be up to when they are out of sight.

To the tens of millions of Americans who are classified as employees, it means the end of the vacation period, and the start of a new work year.

This pause between the economic seasons is honored as Labor's Holiday, when we recall the struggles of the working men and women to win recognition, unity, and collective bargaining power.

Usually, we can add up the gains made by organized labor since the previous Labor Day.

In 1959, we can point to a high level of employment throughout the Nation with the exception of communities like my own where jobs are not available for all the people who want to work. We read with satisfaction that those who are employed are getting somewhat higher wages than they did a year ago this time. Even though this optimism is qualified by the rise in the cost of living which cancels out part of this progress.

Organized labor is in a thoughtful mood on this first Monday in September. Twelve years ago, in 1947, it suffered a setback, via the Taft-Hartley Act. In 1959, it suffered a similar rebuff, through the slightly altered Landrum-Griffin bill.

But these reverses happen as exceptions to the rule of general and steady progress for organized labor. The labor reform bill of 1959 could be a blessing in disguise if it alerts labor to the need for constant vigilance—not only against its enemies, but against its own complacency.

A labor leader, like a Congressman, must represent his own constituents first. From time to time, however, certain issues arise that require him to put the national interest first.

We have a two-party political system in the United States, and a three-party economic system composed of labor, management, and the general public.

Since the Wagner Act liberated organized labor from its servitude, it also provided the opportunity for labor statesmanship. In the State houses across the country, and in the National Capitol, the AFL–CIO has fought for the social and economic legislation that has improved and strengthened our free society.

It is regrettable that a handful of labor leaders seeking absolute power by means that public opinion will not tolerate, have placed the overwhelming majority of law-abiding respectable unions on the defensive.

Liberal Congressmen tried to moderate the emotional demand for legislation to curb these abuses. We managed to get the reasonable Shelley reform bill, supported by labor, before the Congress in an attempt to head off an extreme bill but we were outnumbered.

The new law is a disappointment but not a defeat.

For the organization by which individual workers achieve the collective strength to realize their just goals is an indispensable part of our national economic life.

The principles and ideals of organized labor cannot be stifled by any laws, because these motivations reflect the spirit of the American people. Think of the times that you have taken the lead in fighting for civil rights, and for education, issues which did not mean material gain or an increase in power for the unions.

You went out of your way to help the underprivileged.

That is the secret of your strength. It won the admiration and support of the people in the past and it will do so again.

Leadership and responsibility are indivisible.

Sooner or later leaders in every walk of life learn that public confidence in them is earned only by constructive deeds.

Organized labor will go forward, striving for those objectives that will not only improve the wages and working conditions of its own members, but will also contribute to the progress of the United States and all of its people.

On Labor Day, 1959, we celebrate the genuine accomplishments of unionism through the generations. We are proud of that record, which no one can impeach.

The few racketeers will be booted out and the millions of honest, patriotic members of the AFL–CIO will continue their advance toward social and economic democracy.

THE RECORD RIGGED WITH A BILLION DOLLAR HOAX

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BASS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BASS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, somebody knowingly or not, is rigging the RECORD. And when that RECORD happens to be the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Congress of the United States, corrective action should be taken.

The rigging of the RECORD to which I refer occurs in the tables now appearing in the Daily Digest of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These tables purport to show how financing requests of legislation proposed by the President compare with financing provisions contained in such legislation as passed by the Congress.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Daily Digest for September 4, table II, entitled "New Obligational Authority Provided Outside the Appropriation Process"—so-called back-door financing—is a misleading presentation of half facts.

It compares the cost of a 6-year urban renewal program proposed by the President with a 1-year program passed by Congress. It compares a 4-year airport program proposed by the President with a 2-year program passed by the Congress. That would be just like comparing a $1,200-yearly rental of one individual with the $200-monthly rental of another individual and attempting to claim the cost of the second individual was less than the first. To compare with the table, this would have to be done without ever noting the fact that in the case of the first individual the rental was expressed on an annual basis and the second on a monthly basis.

Lack of appropriate footnotes explaining the differences in time factors of these two programs is misleading the public and even deluding highly placed members of the majority party into publicly claiming savings which do not exist.

The President proposed a 6-year urban renewal program of $1,450 million of which $100 million would become available in fiscal 1959 and $250 million in fiscal 1960. The bill passed by Congress provides $550 million to become available upon enactment, namely in fiscal 1960. In addition to this increase of $200 million, the bill passed by Congress contained $50 million more for college housing than requested by the President and $25 million additional for FNMA purchase of cooperative housing mortgages for which the President did not request any additional authority.

With respect to the airport bill the President proposed a 4-year $200 million program of which $65 million would be come available for commitment in fiscal 1960 and $55 million in fiscal 1961. The 2-year bill passed by the Congress provides $63 million in fiscal 1960 and $63 million in fiscal 1961.

Now let us deal with the facts. Place the President's proposals on the same time basis for activating the obligational authority as that contained in the legislation passed by Congress. Then in place of the decrease by Congress of $825 million shown for the housing bill, the congressional action resulted in an increase of $275 million. In place of a decrease by Congress of $74 million shown for the airport bill, the congressional action resulted in an increase of $6 million.

In other words, the $799 million decrease or "saving" by the Congress—as shown in the third column from the right of table II—actually should be an increase of $381 million.

Mr. Speaker, it is wrong to allow this billion dollar hoax to continue. I call for an immediate end to this rigging of the RECORD.

REDUCTION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. DIXON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I have recently introduced H.R. 8913 which is identical to S. 2506 introduced by Senator WALLACE F. BENNETT, of Utah, cosponsored by Senators PRESCOTT BUSH, of Connecticut, and ROMAN L. HRUSKA, of Nebraska. I believe that legislation along this line is urgently needed to assure the fiscal integrity of Congress.

More than 50 bills have been introduced this year calling for an annual appropriation systematically to reduce the national debt. As far as I know, however, none of these bills except Senator BENNETT'S and my own have the real teeth of automatically raising taxes following a year in which Congress fails to balance the budget and make a payment on the national debt.

We have chosen the figure of $2½ billion for the annual retirement of the debt. This is less than 1 percent of the national debt, and we believe it would be a modest amount. However, Congress could choose its own figure if its adopts this program. As soon as possible after June 30, the end of the fiscal year, the Treasury Department would determine whether we had really balanced the budget and paid off our annual sum for debt retirement. If we had failed, a special tax would be added to all personal and corporate income taxpayers requiring that they pay a specified percentage of their actual tax in addition to their tax as regularly calculated.

The percent for the supplemental tax would be as much as the previous year's budget and debt retirement exceeded Federal revenue. The tax forms would have two extra lines added, one for the "makeup tax" and the other for the total of the regular tax plus the "makeup tax". This is a simple system which would not require any change in the present law in respect to rates, exemptions, exclusion, withholding requirements, and so forth. It would require no changes in the body of rules and regulations nor would the cost of examining tax returns be materially increased. Limit is placed on the "makeup tax" so that it cannot exceed 10 percent in any one year. Thus, if we have another serious deficit like the $12 billion plus that we had in 1959, its effects can be spread forward for a few years and not concentrated into one.

Of course in a year of serious depression or war Congress and the President could repeal the effect of this law for a year. However, the fact that a positive enactment would be required would guarantee against this being done for flippant reasons.

I see the following as some of these urgently needed benefits which would accrue from passage of this bill:

First. It would so restore the confidence of investors in the faith and credit of the U.S. Government that it would restore Government bonds to a prime investment thereby lowering the interest on the debt by possibly as much as the annual appropriation to retire the debt. Considering Congress' reluctance to raise the interest rates on Government bonds, this bill is an effective alternative.

Second. The fact that the Government would reverse its typical position of being a net borrower and become the equivalent of a lender would change the supply and demand for credit so as to lower interest rates generally throughout the economy as well as on Government bonds themselves.

Third. It would save billions of dollars to taxpayers in interest on the debt which is now the largest item in the budget outside of defense and is approaching $9 billion a year. These interest payments amount to a diversion of a trillion dollars in tax funds in just a little more than one century. In just 28 years the cost of repayment plus interest would be less than the cost of interest alone at the start.

Fourth. Systematic reduction of the national debt would help stop inflation dead in its tracks.

Fifth. It would alleviate the pressure for new Federal spending because each program would have to be considered frankly and honestly in the light of its cost in taxes.

Sixth. By increasing people's tax consciousness and making them more clearly aware that they must pay in taxes for every Federal program it would increase the political support for Congress to economize and cut back expensive Federal programs whose cost is not justified.

Seventh. It would restore the balance between the Federal Government and State and local government in handling problems because the Federal Government would suddenly find it didn't have any more money to spare than do local governments, because it would suddenly be bound by the same fiscal rules as local governments.

Eighth. It would enormously strengthen the moral fiber and faith of Americans because the Federal Government would be repaying its debts and not simply postponing the day of reckoning by borrowing money to meet every problem and thereby going into the hole as the Government has 24 out of the past 30 years.

Shortly after Senator BENNETT first introduced this bill the Deseret News on August 20, 1959, published a laudatory editorial which I would like, in conclusion, to include in the RECORD:

SPECIFIC PLAN FOR FISCAL INTEGRITY

Congress may be turning a historic corner with its labor reform bill, and has enjoyed publicity on this matter entirely appropriate to such a history-making step.

But another measure was introduced in Congress last week that could lead to an even more historic, far-reaching, important corner turning. It has had no publicity at all.

Utah's Senator WALLACE F. BENNETT introduced a bill requiring that tax rates be set high enough each year to balance the budget and to provide for annual reduction of the annual debt. The bill was greeted with dead silence, partly, at least, because so much attention was being given just then to the labor fight. But it would be hard to find any single measure now before Congress with a greater potential effected on the Nation's future.

If passed, it could restore America's fiscal integrity, halt inflation in its tracks, stop the drain of gold overseas, and put America on a stable, honest, sound, long-range path.

It would force upon Congress the business-like attitude, "how much can we earn?" not "how much can we spend?"

Senator BENNETT'S plan is devastatingly simple. It sets the goal of a balanced budget and enough surplus for systematic debt reduction. The Senator proposes a surplus of $2.5 billion a year. If income in any given year fell short of reaching that goal, additional personal and corporate income taxes would be levied to make up the difference.

There would be a safety valve, of course. In event of war or other crisis that made a balanced budget inadvisable for any given year, the requirement could be set aside by act of Congress and approval of the President.

The surplus to be used for debt reduction could be set at any level. Perhaps $2.5 billion may seem a little high. But, as Senator BENNETT pointed out to the Senate, even at that figure, it would take at least 115 years to pay off the present debt—even assuming no more wars or other crises.

Some experts will quickly conclude that such a plan is politically impossible, that the American public will not pay such extra taxes—or, more likely, that the politicians will not put themselves in a position where they cannot approve spending without levying taxes to pay for it. Such experts will forget, no doubt, how "impossible" an adequate labor reform bill seemed a few weeks ago.

They might also forget something else, namely, the public's increasing impatience with deficit spending.

In the past 30 years, America has had just 6 surplus years. In that period's peacetime years alone, the average deficit has run $3 billion a year. The public is saying, in no uncertain terms, let's put a stop to it.

The results of that public clamor have been little less than spectacular. This year's Congress, despite all predictions, has not indulged in runaway spending. Some Democrat leaders are trying to take credit for an economy wave. The President's Cabinet Committee on Price Stability even went so far as to declare that fighting inflation is as important a Government goal as is full employment. Not for a long, long time, if ever, has it been as politically popular as it is right now to preach economy and balanced budget.

Senator BENNETT is no Johnny-come-lately in this field; he was almost a lone economy voice in the wilderness not many years ago. The fact that a great many other voices have now been added, reflecting a general public demand, gives the best indication that some such hard but honest plan as his for debt reduction has at least a solid fighting chance.

THE PRESS AND THE CONGRESS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, for many years William R. Mathews of the Tucson Arizona Daily Star has been fighting to remove excessive restrictions on government information. In his own State of Arizona he refused to accept the Governor's contention that the public had no right to read a report by the attorney general which was the basis for the Governor's dismissal of a land commissioner. Bill Mathews took his case to court and proved that such reports are State business.

On the Federal level he has been a strong supporter of congressional attempts to remove the executive arrogance which blocks public access to information which the people must have if they are to participate intelligently in a democratic society. He recognizes clearly that Congress, to be successful in its fight against executive secrecy, needs the backing of the Nation's press. He made that point clear to his fellow editors in the following article published in the September issue of the American Society of Newspaper Editors Bulletin:

A CALL FOR QUICK ACTION—MATHEWS SAYS EDITORS MUST COOPERATE WITH CONGRESSMEN IN THE FIGHT TO OPEN RECORDS OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

(By William R. Mathews)

This is prompted by the articles of Clark Mollenhoff in the July ASNE Bulletin and the July Atlantic Monthly. When any bureaucracy created by Congress successfully defies Congress in refusing to account for its conduct, the time has come for the press of the Nation to act.

It is time to go big game hunting instead of swatting flies or hunting rabbits. I mean that instead of harassing Members of Congress with relatively trivial complaints about closed committee meetings, and accounting publicly for the way they spend their legal office expenses, we should cooperate with them. Indeed, we should urge them to seek a common and paramount objective of accountability to Congress, and to the public by all Government bureaus and departments on the conduct of their offices.

We can remind Members of Congress of the power they have. If they can create an Air Force by statute they can abolish an Air Force by statute. The same applies to the ICA and the most other Government bureaus and agencies.

Some 20 years ago here in Arizona, the legislature abolished an existing highway committee with whom it was at loggerheads. It immediately created a new one with appointees more amenable to cooperating with the legislature.

We should continue more vigorously our present efforts to get a statute requiring various Government agencies to make their public records open for an inspection. The lack of such a statute seriously impairs the feasibility of a taxpayer's suit of mandamus ordering such report. The Mollenhoff articles on how various agencies created by Congress are defying Congress make the issue a timely one. If Congress knew it had the support of the ASNE and the general press and news media of the Nation, it might well be persuaded to act soon; that if it can create a bureau, it can abolish it or starve it when it defies Congress.

We will not get to first base on this issue as long as we make ourselves appear unreasonable to many Members of Congress. We do this when we make such absolute demands as that all committee meetings be open ones, or when we harass and ridicule individual Members for the way they run their offices. We are the last people on earth who should complain about junkets and their cost when made by Members of Congress. We can charge the cost of our junkets to expenses. The big issue is, do we want the support of Congress in seeking our paramount objective, or is it more important to arouse the fear and distrust of Congress by trivial needling of its individual members?

As I see it, the time is ripe to put forth our most vigorous efforts. Timing is such an important factor in the enactment of controversial legislation. We will need not only legal counsel but the formation of a lobby in getting the best legislation we can.

LABOR DAY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment or two, because while the Members of Congress who came here today came voluntarily, the employees were compelled to come and I should like to give them all the time possible.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot leave today without paying a brief tribute to the great people of America, the laboring people, for their wonderful work all these years.

In looking at the picture of President Eisenhower landing at Prestwick, Scotland, I remember that in 1944 I flew from there to the United States. I spoke almost immediately at a rubber corporation plant at Lowell, Mass. I told them that rubber cable was vitally needed at the front. I had seen it in Italy. Although New Years was a holiday, every one of those workers worked all day New Years in order to provide that vital war material for the people at the front, to keep our country and the other countries of the world safe.

SALUTE TO LABOR

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, since this is only the third time that Congress has actually met on Labor Day since the day was established, I believe it is fitting that we here today pay tribute to the working men and women on their national holiday.

Labor pioneer, Peter I. McGuire, of New York, is hailed as the "Father of Labor Day." Founder of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, and cofounder of the American Federation of Labor, he first originated the idea of the annual holiday among the labor organizations in 1882. The movement spread and was finally approved as a national legal holiday by act of Congress, June 28, 1894. It is now observed in the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and U.S. territories.

It is regrettable, indeed, that this year Labor Day is being observed in the wake of new legislation just approved by the Congress which indeed will dull much of labor's legitimate tools in its never-ending struggle to carve a better existence for the American working men and women.

This legislation was enacted in the wake of loosely worded claims that labor unions have an assured and impregnable position in our society. This entire Nation was led to believe that unions are too strong and must be shorn of some of their powers. It was argued that they must be more democratic than the New England town's council of old.

On this Labor Day, we have a right to ask what is the status and the function of the legitimate labor unions in our present-day free enterprise system?

We cannot properly assay the role of labor unions in America today without an understanding of the nature and concentration of modern corporate power. Approximately 50 percent of American manufacturing today is held by about 150 corporations, reckoned on the basis of asset values.

Taking a larger group, it is probable that about two-thirds of the economically productive assets of the United States, excluding agriculture, are owned by a group of not more than 500 corporations.

Thus, in terms of power, not only do 500 corporations control two-thirds of the nonfarm economy, but within that 500 a still smaller group has the ultimate decisionmaking power.

This is the highest concentration of economic power in recorded history.

The concentration of economic power may also be expressed in terms of individuals. Thus, recently the National Bureau of Economic Research made the following finding:

> In 1953 the wealthiest 1 percent of the population owned about 30 percent of all wealth, at least 90 percent of all common stocks, and virtually all State and local government and corporate bonds.

As James Carey, member of the executive board of the AFL–CIO, told the House labor committee recently:

Each corporation is a highly centralized authoritarian institution in which the officers and boards of directors control policy with almost no check or veto from the stockholders. These officers and directors, for all practical purposes, designate their associates and successors on the boards of directors. The result is that a great corporation is an automatic self-perpetuating organization. Such an organization can, of course, act quickly and secretly in the making of policy, and move without delay in executing that policy with massive power. If labor organizations are to have any impact on this type of economic organization, they must be organized in a manner which can cope with authoritarian power of this nature.

John K. Galbraith, certainly one of the most penetrating of American economists, points out that corporate power necessitates comparable union power. He has called it "countervailing power," and illustrates it this way:

> Private economic power is held in check by the countervailing power of those who are subject to it. The first begets the second.

In other words, big industry begets big unions.

Let there be no illusion, however, as to the security of unions today. The struggle to organize unions, and to retain them, is intense and bitter on many sectors of the industrial front. Established unions have to fight for their existence in some industries. A well-known example is the textile industry. Under the law, every union is theoretically subject to extinction when the term of its collective bargaining contract expires and challenge may be made to its continued majority status. While this is only a theory in some instances, it is a painful fact for a very large number of unions. In short, in a very substantial part of American industry, trade unions do not have a secure place.

Such security as they have is under an ever present threat from tightly knit industry employing nonunion help, which is sizable indeed. Only slightly over 33 percent of approximately 50 million nonprofessional and nonsupervisory employees are in trade unions. It must be remembered, however, that this union membership is not evenly distributed. In fact, about 15 million union members are concentrated among about 31 million nonagricultural workers. Less than 10 percent of the remaining 20 million nonagricultural workers are organized. Of about 13 million clerical and sales workers, only about 18 percent are organized. The number of union members among the 6 million domestic and agricultural workers is infinitesimal.

Furthermore, 15 years of relatively sustained prosperity in America since the war ended have led many Americans to lose perspective of the role of the legitimate union in our free enterprise system. I submit that those who are quick to criticize and denounce the union today as being either too strong, or too big, have forgotten the blood, sweat, and yes, even tears, which the people of this country had to sacrifice to bring us to the highest standard of living ever conceived by man. It is significant to me that 57 percent of the Nation's population today has no personal recollection of what a major depression is like. And I think it is fair to ask if the American labor movement has as devastating an effect on our economy as some of the witnesses have claimed before the House Labor Committee of which I am a member, how is it that American industry today is reporting the greatest profits ever imagined by man anywhere in the world throughout the history of this universe?

Too many of our young Americans, in particular, have either never learned or have conveniently forgotten that the very dynamics of a republic, of a free enterprise system, or a capitalistic system such as we have in America today, a system for which thousands of Americans have died in battle to preserve—yes, the very dynamics of this system lies in the never-ending struggle between the employer on the one hand, who seeks—and quite properly so—to retain for himself and his stockholders the highest return of profit on his investment, and at the other end of the spectrum, the American worker, who through his union, engages in the continuing determination to win a higher remuneration, a higher reward, a higher pay for his daily effort.

This great struggle between employer and employee symbolizes the very essence of a democracy. Nowhere in the world have we seen the sort of industrial progress and the dramatic rise in the standard of living as we have in this country simply because we have had, within the framework of a Republic, the basic freedom for these two forces to carry on this constant battle.

It should come as no surprise, then, that the legitimate labor movement on this Labor Day, 1959, has adopted a policy of rededication to the principles of trade unionism.

Legislation passed last week by this Congress and now awaiting the President's signature will impair in many ways the legitimate efforts of organized labor. But, I for one, agree with George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, that legitimate unions have made too indelible a mark on America's economy and progress to be crushed by any one peace of legislation, although admittedly they will have to struggle harder to make any further gains.

On the credit side of this legislation, which I supported with considerable reservation, is the fond hope that the enemies of labor will now be denied their most effective weapon—the charge of corruption against the labor movement. It is my belief that despite the obstacles written into this law, the labor movement may well experience a new era of voluntary enlistment into the ranks of organized labor by those millions of unorganized Americans who have stayed away because unfortunately they believed the propaganda of the National Association of Manufacturers about all labor being corrupt.

As a matter of fact, under the employer reporting provision, perfected in conference, for the first time in American history our people will be able to see for themselves the countless millions of dollars spent by antilabor forces to destroy honest unions. I am sure labor will follow with eager interest these financial reports by employer groups, and I hope the administration will prosecute with the same vigor those employers or employer groups who would falsify their reports as it plans to prosecute labor organizations suspected of any similar abuses.

On this Labor Day, 1959, I earnestly hope the leaders of the American labor movement will indeed rededicate their efforts to trade union principles and intensify their efforts for survival. Let us not forget that every despot in the history of the world first destroyed the labor movement in his respective country before his conquest of other human liberties could succeed. This was true of Hitler; this is true today of Khrushchev.

Let those who would destroy the legitimate aims of the American labor movement keep well in mind the indisputable fact that should the legitimate American trade union movement ever be destroyed, something else is bound to come in its place. History shows that free people have always suffered when class war became the order of the day.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND WORLD BANK

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARR] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARR. Mr. Speaker, on March 25, 1959, I made my first speech in the House of Representatives in defense of a bill which would authorize the United States to increase its capital investment in the International Monetary Fund and in the World Bank. One of the provisions of this bill provided that 25 percent of our subscription to the Monetary Fund should be paid in gold to the amount of $344 million. During the debate, the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. HALEY] raised the question,

"Do we have enough gold to support this additional investment in another International Bank?" He also asked, "Does anyone know whether this country has enough gold to meet the obligations that it has incurred all over the world?" These are not exact quotes but summed up his questions as I understood them.

At that time I was not adequately prepared to answer the gentleman, and I do not believe that any Member gave him a satisfactory answer. Since that date, however, these questions have tended to haunt me, and I have conducted an intensive investigation as to the gold position in the United States, in an attempt to find answers to the questions propounded by the gentleman from Florida. I think that I have found some answers, and this speech today is dedicated to an attempt to provide Mr. HALEY and the Members of this Congress with the answers that I have dug up. The questions were certainly valid, and the answers seem to indicate the United States will soon have to face up to a change in many of its international policies—especially in the field of foreign aid and military expenditures outside of the United States.

The first question that Mr. HALEY asked, "Do we have enough gold to support an additional investment in these international banks?"—can be answered with an unqualified "Yes." Our gold position at the moment is sufficiently strong in my opinion to justify this investment in the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. It is also sufficiently strong to justify our investment in the newly created Inter-American Bank in which we are cooperating with 21 Latin American nations in an attempt to work out some of our economic problems in the Western Hemisphere. The second question that Mr. HALEY asked, "Do we have enough gold to meet all the obligations that the United States has incurred all over the world?"—can be answered with a flat "No." I am inserting in the RECORD the following table showing the gold position of the United States over the last 10 years:

Source: U.S. official data.

If you will look at this table, you will note that there has been a dramatic change in the gold position in the United States since 1949. In 1949 the United States had $24½ billion in its gold stock. We needed $10½ billion to meet the required reserve of 25 percent behind our currency and the member bank deposits of the Federal Reserve Board. This left an excess of $12½ billion in gold which could be used to meet foreign claims. In 1949 these claims, official and private, amounted to $6 billion. So the distinguished gentleman from Florida and my colleagues can see that in that year we had enough gold to back up our currency and demand deposits in the Federal Reserve System and still had twice as much gold left over as we needed to meet any foreign claims.

Another look at the chart though will show that starting in 1950, the United States has had a continuous drain on its gold with the exception of two years—1952 and 1957. The record of this 10 years has been one of a steady decline in the gold resources of this Nation. On May 31 of 1959, the last date for which the figures are available, the U.S. supply of gold had fallen to $20½ billion—a loss of about $4 billion in 10 years. Of this amount we needed a little less than $12 billion to back up our currency and the member bank deposits of the Federal Reserve Board. This left $8 billion to meet the demands of the foreigners, official and private, who had claims against the United States. These claims jumped from the $6 billion that I mentioned, in 1949, to $15½ billion on May 31, 1959. So today, Mr. HALEY, we are short $7½ billion if all the potential demands for gold hit us at one time. In all honesty, I can tell the distinguished gentleman and my colleagues that this is highly unlikely. As a matter of fact, only $8½ billion of the $15½ billion held by foreigners, is ever likely to be converted into gold. This is the amount held by foreign banks and foreign governments. But even there we can see that we are short a half billion at the moment if all these claims on our gold were cashed in at once—back in 1949 totals held by foreign banks and governments amounted to only $3 billion while our excess gold amounted to $12½ billion, so we had the claims covered by a 4 to 1 ratio.

I am going to digress here just a bit in an attempt to find out what has been the trouble. Why has this run on the gold of the United States developed over the past 10 years? First of all, let us look at why we do lose gold. The basic reason that we lose gold is that we are spending more abroad than we are getting from foreign countries. The total that we spend abroad, however, is made up of several totals. The principal items of our expenditures overseas are goods that we buy abroad, transportation charges, travel by American citizens in foreign countries, military spending abroad, Government grants to foreign countries, Government loans to foreign countries, and private investments abroad. Our principal source of income from foreign countries comes from goods that we sell abroad, transportation charges paid to us, money that foreigners spend to travel in the United States, and the income that we receive from our investments overseas. This is a brief summary of how we spend our money overseas and where our income from overseas comes from.

Now, let us take a look to see where the trouble really is. You will find a lot of people who say that the United States is pricing itself out of oversea markets—that our prices are becoming so high that people in foreign countries simply cannot afford to buy our products. The record simply does not bear this out. The record shows that the United States through last year has had a vigorous and strong competitive position in its exports. Over the past 10 years we have maintained the relative position of our exports to total world trade. Over this 10-year period our exports have run from 17½ to 19 percent of the total export trade in the world. To give you a few figures—in 1950 the U.S. exports amounted to 17.7 percent of world trade; in 1954 they amounted to 17 percent; in 1958 they amounted to 17.2 percent. In 1956 and 1957, because of the Suez crisis, they jumped temporarily to 18.7 percent in 1956, and 19.4 percent in 1957. When we stop to consider that in this 10-year span, the United States has had to face rough competition from the countries that have rebuilt their economies and their industrial plants after World War II, all of us would have to agree that American industry, labor, and salesmanship have turned in a truly magnificent record. There is absolutely no evidence to show that the reason that we are losing gold is the fault of American industry.

The other side of the coin is the argument that we hear so frequently that the United States is buying a lot more from foreign countries than it used to. Of course, one of the most dramatic examples has been the success of small foreign cars in this country. This has led many people to jump to the conclusion that the United States has suddenly gone on a binge of buying foreign products. This simply is not true. It is true, of course, that we are buying a lot more foreign products, but we are buying even more relatively from our home production. I am going to insert a table here at this point, showing the total imports of the United States as a percentage of gross national product from 1951 through 1958:

TABLE 2.—U.S. imports and the gross national product

Year	GNP	Imports	Imports, GNP
	Billions	Billions	Percent
1951	$329.0	$11.07	3.37
1952	347.0	10.79	3.11
1953	365.4	10.97	3.00
1954	363.1	10.30	2.99
1955	397.5	11.46	2.91
1956	419.2	12.74	3.04
1957	440.3	13.14	2.98
1958	437.7	12.94	2.96

A look at this chart will show that in 1951 the United States bought $11 billion from overseas, and that our gross national product was $329 billion. Thus our imports were 3.37 percent of our gross national product. This percentage, as you will see from the chart, dropped every year with the exception of 1956. In 1958, when the foreign-car boom was running full blast, we bought $13 billion from oversea producers against a gross national production of $438 billion. In 1958, as you can see, our imports ran 2.96 percent of our gross national product. It is evident from these figures that we have not gone on a foreign buying binge, and that we are not using a larger proportion of our U.S. money to buy things produced overseas.

It is obvious from the above that there is nothing wrong with our export markets or our ability to sell overseas. It is also obvious that we are not spending too much of our money on imports. The truth of the matter is that we have consistently increased our trade surplus every year since 1950. The following table is inserted to point out these facts:

[In millions]

Year	Trade surplus	Current account surplus
1950	$1,009	$1,856
1951	2,921	3,534
1952	2,481	3,757
1953	1,291	2,355
1954	2,445	3,849
1955	2,753	4,304
1956	4,530	5,981
1957	6,036	8,354
1958	3,263	5,232

The only inconsistencies in the table are the years 1956 and 1957. Here again the Suez crisis distorted the picture and jumped our sales in 1956 and 1957 to an unusual degree. If you knock out those years you will see that our trade surplus, the excess of what we sell over what we buy, has increased steadily—from a billion dollars in 1950 to $3.2 billion in 1958. This surely is dramatic evidence that the reason we are losing gold does not lie with American industry or American labor. Then what is the trouble? The trouble lies with the Government of the United States and the investment of private funds overseas.

Table No. 4, which I am inserting, shows what has happened in these two areas since 1950:

[In millions]

Year	U.S. private net capital outflow	U.S. Government expenditures and transfers
1950	$1,265	$4,742
1951	1,068	5,931
1952	1,158	6,940
1953	369	8,844
1954	1,619	7,318
1955	1,211	7,259
1956	2,980	7,836
1957	3,211	8,136

NOTE.—Tables Nos. 2, 3, and 4 were taken from a paper entitled "International Position of the United States Dollar", by Edward M. Bernstein.

In 1950 the private investment of U.S. companies and individuals in foreign investments amounted to $1,265 million. In 1958 it had jumped to $2,924 million. The expenditures and transfers of the United States of America which include military expenditures overseas, grants of military supplies, other grants, and U.S. net capital outflow, jumped from $4,700 million in 1950 to $8½ billion in 1958.

The first side of this picture—the U.S. private investment overseas—is not necessarily a cause for alarm on the gold situation. These investments bring a return to the United States and cause funds from foreign nations to flow back to this country. The real trouble lies in the enormous expenditures the Government of the United States of America has made overseas. There is no return on this investment except the hope of preserving the peace of the world. Since 1950, in spite of the fact that we have consistently had a surplus in our world trade position, as a result of the efforts of U.S. industry, still the Government of the United States has managed to spend more abroad than we have earned—to the tune of $11 billion. This is the reason for our current position. This is the reason that I must tell the gentleman from Florida that today we do not have enough gold to back up our own currency and still meet all the potential demands of foreign nations and individuals.

I am not going to be a demagogue at this point and insist that the United States is in a dangerous position. We are not. We do have enough gold to make the investment in the World Bank and Monetary Fund prudent and sound. We do have enough gold to make the investment in the Inter-American Bank with safety and reason. Compared to the rest of the world we are still loaded with gold. The point that I am trying to bring out here is that we cannot continue the policies which have characterized this Government for the past 10 years. The United States cannot continue to loan and grant to nations all over the world more money than our industry and our labor can earn in overseas sales. We cannot continue policies that pile up deficits of $11 billion in our trade balances over 10-year periods. If we do that, the Communists will have won an important victory because our financial leadership of the world will definitely be imperiled.

I voted against the mutual security appropriation because these facts were becoming apparent to me. In the late forties the United States was dedicating its funds to rebuilding a ravaged world. We were the only free nation in a position to do it. About 1952 a good part of the world had rebuilt its industrial plant and was ready to go. Since that time the nations of Western Europe have stepped up their production and recaptured their world markets—Germany's share of the world market jumped from 10 percent in 1951 to 18.6 percent in 1958, and Japan's share jumped from 4.3 percent in 1951 to 6 percent in 1958. After rebuilding their plant and recapturing their share of the world markets, the countries of Western Europe especially, began a drive to rebuild their own balances of gold. To a large extent this was a healthy drive because it enabled them to make their currencies sound and conservative. It put the nations of Western Europe and Japan back in a strong financial position. It put them in a position where now they can compete toe to toe with the United States and the world market.

Now that they are up to date, however, it seems to me ridiculous that this Nation should continue to transfer our reserves of gold and dollars to these nations in the forms of military grants and aid programs that are no longer needed. It is high time that the United States says to the nations of Western Europe and Japan—"Look here. We put you back on your feet; we have given you the gold reserves that you need to run your country on a sound and conservative basis, now let us all pitch in and share the cost of protecting and developing the world." Their stake in the freedom and security of this world is as great as ours. We have followed a pattern of unparalleled generosity in rebuilding these nations. Now it is high time for them to put their shoulders to the wheel and give the U.S. taxpayer a hand.

Although I voted against mutual security, I fought for the increased capitalization of the World Bank and the Monetary Fund. I fought for the creation of the Inter-American Bank. Every one of these institutions has moved on the principle that every nation must do its share.

The United States of America might as well look the facts in the face. We no longer have the gold reserves to support an aid program on the scale that we have in the past. The countries of Western Europe and Japan are now in a position to pick up their share. It is high time that we dispel the notion prevalent all over the world that any time there is trouble the United States will come forward with the cash. It is high time that we tell them, "Look, we will do our share, but you must do yours." Any other course is bound to lead to disaster and a resounding Communist victory.

BIRTH CENTENNIAL OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT — NOTABLE CANAL ZONE CELEBRATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, one of the best planned and most successful of all the many programs commemorating the centenary of the birth, October 27, 1858, of Theodore Roosevelt, our 26th President, was that presented in the Canal Zone during the week of November 9 to 15, 1958, and which brought into special focus the historic visit to the Isthmus of Panama made by him in November 1906. That visit, in addition to other vital features, was the first ever made by a President of the United States to a foreign country—in this instance, Panama.

The Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Committee which had charge of the collective event consisted of the Governor of the Canal Zone, Gen. W. E. Potter; Lt. Gov. John D. McElheny; executive chairmen, Pacific side, Mrs. Amy McCormack, and Atlantic side, Gerard K. Schear; general chairman, W. G. Arey, Jr.; dedication ceremony, Gerard K. Schear, chairman; transportation and reservations, F. G. Dunsmoor, chairman; budget, Philip L. Stears, chairman; bust and plaque, Lt. Col. R. D. Brown, Jr., chairman; invitations, Fred deV. Sill, chairman; participating groups, Mrs. Amy McCormack, chairman; construction-day open house and dance, Edward A. Doolan, chairman; conservation ceremony, Judge John E. Deming, chairman; programs and publicity, J. Rufus Hardy; pageant, Victor Herr and Donald Musselman; and veterans' day, Alfred Gauvin, the American Legion, and Ralph W. Zachry, the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Every day of the celebration had its special features to make and emphasize some facet or phase of the versatile character of Theodore Roosevelt. Thus, to enumerate, Sunday, November 9, "Father and Family Man"; Monday, "Pioneer, Adventurer, and Naturalist"; Tuesday, "Soldier"; Wednesday, "Public Servant"; Thursday, "Social Reformer"; Friday, "Statesman"; and Saturday, November 15, "American." These subjects were all treated in appropriate manner by means of pictures, speeches, TV, and radio; and this was carried through on both sides of the isthmus, but without duplication. The whole was punctuated by excellent musical programs by the high school and military bands.

Particular emphasis was given, of course, to the genesis and construction of the Panama Canal, with which the dynamite "Teddy" had so much to do.

Something like 60 or 70 oldtimers—surviving U.S. citizens of the canal construction era of half a century ago—were in attendance—a few with their wives or other members of their families. Most of these had voyaged to the isthmus on the two Panama Line steamers, the Ancon, Captain Foley; and the Cristobal, Captain Gorman. A few of the old timers, like Frederick G. Swanson, of Tyler, Tex., had flown to the isthmus for the occasion. Thus, old friendships were renewed, and olden scenes were brought to life. All ship passengers arriving at the port of Cristobal—wearing Rough Rider hats—were greeted by Governor Potter and others of his staff. Every arrangement possible for the comfort, convenience, and entertainment of the visitors had been provided. The Panama Canal Company gave special passage rates to all thus attending—all of whom, as was required, were Roosevelt medal holders, those who had served not less than 2 years in the construction work, in whatever capacity, during the canal building years. It was the desire of Governor Potter and the Panama Canal Company to have a goodly number of these veterans of the canal to attend and join in the celebration; and the total of these who thus participated was, indeed, gratifying. But few of them had ever been back to the isthmus since the construction days—not many of them since the canal went into operation—and their enjoyment was obvious.

Among the distinguished visitors in attendance were Mrs. Ethel Roosevelt Derby, daughter of Theodore Roosevelt, and her two daughters, Mrs. Robert T. Gannet and Mrs. Adelbert Ames and husband, Dr. Ames. These came and went by air. They received a most cordial welcome, and, with zeal, took part in various programs.

In the category of distinguished visitors and participants there were also former Isthmian Canal Commissioner and Congressman, Maurice H. Thatcher, of Kentucky and Washington, D.C., and Mrs. Thatcher; and Dr. Herman Hagedorn, of New York, and Mrs. Hagedorn.

Governor Thatcher is the only surviving member of the Isthmian Canal Commission—the body charged with the duty of supervising the construction of the canal; and during the period of his tenure he also served as civil Governor of the Canal Zone, in immediate charge of all the civil agencies, and representing the Commission in all its relations with the Government of Panama.

The Thatchers traveled by Panama liners to and from the isthmus; and about 60 other oldtimers similarly traveled. The Hagedorns went by ship, and returned by air.

Dr. Hagedorn served as Director and Secretary of the Theodore Roosevelt Centennial Commission, the national body created by act of Congress to formulate and execute plans for the centenary celebration, which were so extensively carried out throughout the States, territories, and possessions of the United States during 1958. He is a widely known author and biographer of Theodore Roosevelt, and has long been an intimate friend of the Roosevelt family.

Some of the highlights of the week's celebration may be indicated. On the evening of November 10 Dr. Hagedorn delivered an informal but very interesting address on Theodore Roosevelt, with especial reference to his life in the West. This was under the auspices of the Canal Zone post of the American Society of Military Engineers, at a dinner in the Tivoli Guest House—the historic Tivoli Hotel built by John E. Stevens, chief engineer of the canal project, in 1906.

During the week Dr. Hagedorn appeared on several other programs and gave much valuable historical and personal information concerning the life and deeds of Theodore Roosevelt.

On November 11—Armistice-Veterans Day—a fine program was put on at Balboa. This included marchings and parades by military, school, and youthful scout organizations, and a patriotic address by Lt. Gen. Ridgely L. Gaither, U.S. commander of the Caribbean forces. In addition Governor Thatcher presented medals to the winners, on the Pacific side, of the contest for the best student essays on Theodore Roosevelt: First, Arthur O'Leary; second, Jane Shannard; and third, Dorothy Strumpf.

A splendid address on the life and character of Theodore Roosevelt was delivered at the Balboa Theater on the evening of November 13 by Governor Thatcher. He was greeted by a capacity audience which included many Panamanian officials and their wives, the group headed by the President of Panama, Hon. Ernesto de la Guardia, Jr., and Senora. Also present were a large number of zonians, including prominent officials of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone Government, led by Governor Potter; as were, also, many of the U.S. Army and Naval contingents and the diplomatic establishments. In addition there was noted the presence of Congressman John M. Robsion, Jr., of Louisville, Ky., and Mrs. Robsion, who were on tour of the South American Continent by air. The program for the evening was given under the supervision of the Isthmian Historical Society—a youthful, but already a greatly distinguished organization—with its president, L. B. Burnham, presiding.

Governor Potter presented Governor Thatcher, who was cordially received by the audience, and his address followed, at the close of which, as stated in the Panama press, he was given a standing ovation.

The other feature of the evening was the presentation of a very colorful and interesting pageant commemorative of canal construction conditions during the Stevens era, and included a clever reenactment of the principal scenes of the visit of President Theodore Roosevelt to the isthmus in November 1906. In this feature "Johnnie" Ehrman, well known and popular Panamanian, did a most entertaining and effective sketch in his depiction of Dr. Amador, one of the prime movers in the Panamanian revolution of 1903, and first President of the Panamanian Republic.

Appropriate memorial programs in honor of Theodore Roosevelt—"T. R." and "Teddy," as he was everywhere called by the Old Timers—were given by the American Legion, church, civic, Masonic, and other organizations. Among other interesting features of the celebration was a tree-planting ceremony, with a tree planted in memory of Mr. Roosevelt, in Balboa, with Judge John E. Deming in charge, and with participation of Mrs. Derby; a meeting of the attending Roosevelt Medal holders in the Tivoli Guest House; and the tape recording of their voices and talks with respect to experiences on the isthmus during the construction period; a run through Culebra—Gaillard—Cut by the Old Timers; and addresses at a luncheon of the Canal Zone College Club—women—delivered by Assistant Secretary of Defense, Dr. Frank B. Berry, and Mrs. Thatcher—the latter speaking most interestingly of social conditions, aspects, and experiences during the construction years. Also, there was a well attended and enthusiastic gathering of alien employees of the Panama Canal enterprise in Morris Hall in Ancon, which was addressed by Governor Thatcher, Fred Sill, and others.

Finally, on Saturday, November 15, the last day of the celebration, there took place in the Administration Building in Balboa Heights, the unveiling and presentation of a fine bust of Theodore Roosevelt donated by Edward A. Bacon, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Army—Mrs. Bacon performing the act of unveiling; and the presentation, also, of a plaque, appropriately inscribed with a famous quotation from Theodore Roosevelt, and placed in the rotunda of the Administration Building as a companion piece of the bust. The plaque was presented by Walter F. Berman, Vice President of the American Society of Civil Engineers, acting in behalf of the society, and was dedicated to all those who participated in the construction of the Panama Canal, regardless of race or nationality, and it is the only tangible memorial in the Canal Zone so broadly—and justly—based.

As a feature of the day's program a very interesting address was delivered by Assistant Secretary of the Army, George H. Roderick. The Latin American School Glee Club featured the program with some lovely singing.

Also, reference should be made to the issuance of a special 4-cent postage stamp on November 15. It is brown colored, with the first and reverse sides of the Roosevelt Panama Canal Medal depicted, and bearing the inscription "Theodore Roosevelt 1858–1958." A folder containing one of the first day's issue was presented to each Roosevelt Medal holder in attendance upon the celebration.

Thus the outstanding celebration came to a close; and in its various and most interesting events it is believed that it was in no wise excelled by any like celebration in the United States—if, in fact, equaled. It was characterized by the Panama American as being "the most elaborate and comprehensive public ceremonies ever held in the Canal Zone."

As something distinct from all this, yet apropos, was the formal dedication, on Sunday afternoon, November 16, by Governor Thatcher, in the town of Arraijan, in the Republic of Panama, of a splendidly equipped playground for the children of the Arraijan area. He was responsible for the establishment and equipment of the playground, having furnished the grounds therefor, and having selected and, joined by the Government of Panama, having purchased the equipment. The playground was named by the municipal authorities of Arraijan "Parque Infantil Thatcher," or, in English, "Thatcher playground." Also, Arraijan, with a population of about 3,000 and situated on the west side of the Canal about 12 miles from the city of Panama, was recently divided into two municipal divisions, one of which is designated "Barriada Thatcher." A street in the town is named "Calle Thatcher." The dedication ceremonies were attended by a large number, including Panamanian and Arraijan officials who, in their talks referred to Governor Thatcher as the "benefactor of Arraijan and Panama." Several hundred schoolchildren welcomed the Thatchers with waving Panamanian and U.S. flags. Residents of the Arraijan community have been most grateful for the ferry and highway later mentioned.

In news stories and the editorial columns of Panamanian newspapers Governor Thatcher was lauded as a friend and benefactor of the Panamanian people, and an early and effective advocate of the "good neighbor" policy. The heartiest greetings were everywhere—both in the Canal Zone and Panama—accorded him and his greatly esteemed "esposa."

He had, indeed, rendered honorable and effective service—not only during the construction days of the canal—but since then, both in and out of Congress. Then Mrs. Thatcher, during her husband's official tenure on the isthmus, had learned to speak the Spanish language with fluency, and this fact endeared her to Panamanians. Moreover, she had proven herself to be a gracious and popular hostess. In Congress Governor Thatcher was the author of important legislation affecting the canal, the Canal Zone, and the Republic of Panama, such as the act establishing the free ferry at the Pacific entrance of the canal and providing for the construction of the connecting zone road on the west side of the canal—both officially named for him; and the act providing for the establishment and permanent operation and maintenance of the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, located in the city of Panama, and now known and esteemed throughout the world. The Laboratory is one of the outstanding institutions of the tropical regions dealing with research on the cause and prevention of tropical disease—with especial emphasis on yellow fever—of which in South and Central America there has been a recrudescence in recent years, also malaria and sand fly ailments. With ever-increasing agencies of transportation—by sea, air, and land, including the Inter-American Highway System—the value of this institution becomes more and more apparent. This is true, not only as to the tropics, but as well to our own country. In recent years the Laboratory has done much to determine the fact that monkeys, marsupials—including opossums—are reservoirs for yellow fever, and that newer types of mosquitoes—vectors or carriers of the dread virus—live and breed in the "canopy of the jungle," thus presenting new problems of peril. Also, through the years—both in and out of Congress—Governor Thatcher has done much for Panama Canal and Panama Railroad employees—construction and afterconstruction eras—in the way of obtaining beneficial legislation for both American citizens and noncitizens.

Coming to the Isthmus during the week of celebration for a brief visit was a small congressional group made up of Congresswoman LEONOR K. SULLIVAN, of Missouri, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Panama Canal—House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries; WILLIAM K. VAN PELT, of Wisconsin, also a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and Mrs. Van Pelt; MELVIN R. LAIRD, of Wisconsin, member of the House Appropriations Committee, and Mrs. Laird; and EMMET F. BYRNE, of Illinois, and members of his family.

Among the old timers who made the pilgrimage by ship were Stephen Latchford, president of the Panama Canal Society of Washington, D.C., and several past presidents of the society, Ben Jenkins, Col. David R. Wolverton, Governor Thatcher, and Andrew W. Dewling. Also Frank S. Wichman, president of the Panama Canal Society of Chicago, and Mrs. Wichman; and Mrs. Frederick D. Willson, of Washington, D.C., who, like Mrs. Thatcher, is a past president of the Panama Canal Society Auxiliary of Washington.

All of the old timers returned to their respective homes throughout the States, refreshed and revitalized—as the contact with "fountain of youth"—by the visit to the scenes of their historic labors a half century ago, and the experiences which were theirs during the fleeting days of the celebration. Very grateful they were, indeed, for the heart-warming greetings received by them on the Isthmus, and for the many fine courtesies accorded them by the Panama Canal Co., the Panama Line, Governor Potter, and others of the Panama Canal enterprise; and also by the officials, the people, and press of Panama and the Canal Zone.

Through the eloquence of their presence the old timers lent a very strong note of color and vitality to the memorial event; and the contributions made thereto by Governor Thatcher and Dr. Hagedorn were, indeed, of notable character.

The Star and Herald and the Panama American—the two leading bilingual dailies of Panama, with story, picture, and editorial treatment greatly aided in the success of the celebration, as did, also, the Panama Canal Review, the official magazine of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone Government. The following is quoted from an editorial of November 19, 1958, in the Star and Herald, one of the oldest newspapers in the Western Hemisphere:

OLD CANAL ZONE HOMEWEEK ENDS

Today Panama and the Canal Zone bid farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Maurice H. Thatcher and 29 other oldtimers and Isthmian friends who will sail for their U.S. homes by the Panama liner Ancon.

It has been wonderful for all of us local residents, both of Panama and the Canal Zone, irrespective of our lands of origin, to meet these fine people, hear them speak and get their versions of life as lived here in the early days of Panama Canal construction.

By their interest in life, although many are in the old-age brackets, they seem to have stood the tropics well during their employment in the Canal Zone. Perhaps it was the Chagres River water they drank here that helped them survive the hardships the early Canal Zone population had to face. Possibly it lured them back here.

Perhaps it was the sense of adventure that brought them here. Whatever the urge that brought them, they not only accomplished their tasks for their Uncle Sam, they also learned to love the tasks they found here.

All we can say to the dear oldtime Gringos is "Hasta luego, compañeros; come back and see us sometime. You'll always be welcome."

In conclusion, it may be said that this extensive, intensive commemoration of the birth of Theodore Roosevelt wrote another stirring chapter in the long and dramatic history of the Panamanian Isthmus—a spot of the earth where, because geography, the surrounding seas, and climate, have given it a great role in the providences of time and destiny. To Governor Potter and his associates in planning and executing a program of commemoration with so great a skill and judgment, the thanks of all our people are due; in fact the thanks of all everywhere, by such occasions of reminder history is vitalized and cherished.

Under leave accorded there is included as a part of these remarks the very able and eloquent address of Governor Thatcher. I believe that it, together with the story presented, well deserves a place in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The address follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. MAURICE H. THATCHER ON THEODORE ROOSEVELT AT BALBOA THEATER, NOVEMBER 13, 1958

At the outset I must thank Governor Potter for his very kind invitation to Mrs. Thatcher and myself to attend this Isthmian celebration of the centenary of the birth of Theodore Roosevelt. I am also deeply grateful for this opportunity to participate at this time, and in this way, in the program; and I include in my thanks the committees especially created to formulate the program.

In addition, I must express grateful appreciation for the presence of President de la Guardia, and other high officials and friends from Panama. Also, I wish to take advantage of the occasion to express for and on behalf of all the old timers, the Roosevelt medal holders, and those with them, coming on this historic pilgrimage, their deepest gratitude to the Governor and the Directors of the Panama Canal Company for the invitation to visit the isthmus for this commemoration, and for the steamship rate accorded, and the acommodations here arranged for. We assure you, Governor Potter, and all your helpers and associates, that the fine courtesies thus bestowed will never be forgotten. Having been, in varying capacities, part and parcel of the vast and unique organization which dug the "ditch," we—out of greatly reduced ranks, which are thinning with ever-increasing acceleration—are justly proud of, and grateful for, the privilege of joining in this effort to pay fitting tribute to him who, at the nod of destiny, acted with promptitude, wisdom, and strength to bring to glorious fruition, the greatest dream of the centuries.

In the construction of this great waterway the vast peace army here assembled, performed, indeed, the mightiest industrial feat ever known, before which the greatest marvels of the past pale into insignificance. The Pyramids of Egypt, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, and other famed wonders, all created by enslaved labor, to serve the pride and vanity of despotic rulers, counted for little of intrinsic public good, when compared with what was here fashioned by a free nation, and free men, this unrivaled instrument of commerce and good will which stretches from one to the other ocean in perpetual benefaction to all the world. Not only my own country, but as well, all lands and peoples, owe eternal gratitude to all those who built the canal, from the highest to the least; the chief of whom was and is the great leader whom we now strive to honor. Included in all the overall list are those of the Panamanian Republic, who, in the overwhelming emergency which arose, met it with the vision, energy, and patriotic action the situation required. There is, indeed, glory enough for all, and impartial history must so declare. And then we must not forget those who, through the succeeding years—in peace and in war—have maintained, defended, preserved, and successfully operated the canal. They, too, have earned the enduring gratitude of all.

Time and the scythe have cut deep, indeed, into the ranks of those who labored here in the construction era. The lengthening of their lives, paradoxically, has shortened them, for always the inevitable barrier has to be met. In the construction days the payroll, at times, embraced more than 50,000 employees. Of the citizens of the United States here engaged, only an approximate guess may be ventured as to how many yet survive. Under the Panama Canal Construction Annuity Act of 1944 which yielded for U.S. citizens an initial total of about 2,900 annuitants, meeting the 3-year requirement of eligibility, death has substantially reduced this number. Then there are those with lesser periods of service. An even greater percentage of mortality has occurred, I am sure, among the unskilled workers; but all were dedicated to the performance of a great task, and they did not falter or fail.

For all those who rendered service here in the construction era, it may be said that—

All were as one; and they strove and wrought
To shape the passage to the Ind.
In terms of life it was dearly bought;
In money, cheap. The ranks are thinned
By time and death, but the deed they did
Excels all others of like and kind;
Its strength and virtue cannot be hid.
It lives—all tongues and lands to bind!

At this juncture I ask, as something fitting that we should do, that all of us stand for a moment in silent reverence of the memory of all of those of this great army of workers who have gone on before.

The task assigned me this evening—though pleasing in most of its aspects—is quite formidable in others. So much has been written and spoken of the great man being honored in this centennial year—and so well written and spoken—that I must needs approach my subject with great diffidence. This is especially true because there is now present a most excellent biographer of our 26th President, the Director and Secretary of the Theodore Roosevelt Centennial Commission, Dr. Hermann Hagedorn; in which capacity, I may add, he has been discharging a most exacting duty in a most acceptable manner.

In my opinion, among the many programs for this centennial celebration throughout the United States and its contacts, none has been better planned than that which is here under observance. The thanks of all are due Governor Potter and the memorial committees and the directors of the Panama Canal Company and all associates for their effective labors to make this celebration a climactic success. Included for thanks are the Panama Canal Review and the press of Panama. By and through them there has been fully disseminated the story of this celebration.

From a life so crowded with vital deeds and experiences, as was that of Theodore Roosevelt, it is hard to choose what is most fitting for mention and comment in a general presentation of the subject. My theme has been announced as that of "Social Reformer," though I have been assured that more latitude has been given me. I shall so proceed, but will endeavor to give emphasis to the indicated title. In this celebration, running from the 9th to the 15th of November, the program wisely and effectively features different phases of the character and achievements of Theodore Roosevelt.

The date of his birth, as you know, was October 27, 1858, and the place of his birth, New York City. His father was Theodore Roosevelt, a man of fine integrity and business capacity, and member of a distinguished family of Dutch descent, and other interminglings. The mother was Martha Bulloch, a native of Georgia—a woman of especial charm and breeding. She came of a long line of Scotch, Huguenot, and English descents. In the blood of the youthful Theodore, there was, therefore, many strains of the sturdy types of early settlers and builders of our Nation. Thus he was heir to a fine American heritage, and came to a discharge of the duty thus imposed with sympathetic understanding. He was, indeed, an ideal American and, in the presence of distinguished Latin Americans, I may say that the term "American" is used in an idiomatic and, perhaps, rather provincial way, as peculiarly attaching to the United States. All the peoples of the Western Hemisphere are Americans, and as such are entitled to share with us the name. From habit and convenience I shall, however, use it, and none will take offense.

Growing up as a physically weak and sickly child, afflicted with defective sight, his early life was one of grave discouragement. Urged by his father to strive to overcome these infirmities, and to become strong and forceful, young Theodore responded with the utmost ardor and success. By his determined and lasting resolve he was, physically and mentally speaking, literally born again. By a thoughtfully planned and executed system of exercise, including boxing, he emerged from the condition of weakness and fear to that of robust health and strength, crowned and blessed with fearlessness, self-confidence, and a magnificent ambition to play an important role in life. These qualities forever after distinguished him, and brought him success in every field of his endeavor. Indeed, from the date of his rejuvenation until his death, he preached and practiced the worth of the strenuous life.

The young Theodore, with eager and inquiring mind, turned to the study of natural history, a subject that greatly engrossed his interest through all the years to follow. Indeed, his love of natural history was such, that with his vital energy and thirst for practical results, he might have become—had he devoted his life to the task—a scientist in this field, comparable with some of the most eminent naturalists, such as Humboldt and Agassiz. As it was, he thus elicited the wonder and admiration of all, including distinguished men of science. This bent of his mind doubtless led to his famous travels, including safari in Africa, and the tragic tour in South America. Had he given his years to exploration and travel, he might have been another Livingston or Stanley.

Early in life he became imbued with an intense desire to serve the public weal; and he was practical enough to know that, to be effective, it was necessary to ally himself with a great political organization, and his associations and general beliefs were such that he chose the party of Lincoln, and always he sought to use his influence in making of it an instrument of progress.

From this point let us go hastily on. The father of our Theodore left him a comfortable means, and he was thus free to undertake in life the task and labors to which he was most inclined. On leaving Harvard, where he graduated, he became a member of the 21st district Republican Association or club in New York City. Then he was elected to the lower house of the State of New York in 1881, and re-elected in 1883. This was the so-called silk-stocking district. The city of New York was then under the complete control of Tammany Hall. He was civic minded, and possessed of the finest traits of integrity, courage, and leadership. He dedicated his life to a political career, and consecrated all his energies and talents to the task of helping to bring about social betterment and civic reform. In the general assembly he had to fight both political machines in his effort to procure legislation curative of evils in taxation and other matters, and, against heavy odds, was surprisingly successful.

In 1883 he went to the Red Lands of North Dakota and there acquired two cattle ranches and, for several years, he operated them. He became a rancher and cowboy, and had many thrilling and ofttimes dangerous experiences—in dealing with the rough men he met there in a country where the law of the first draw usually prevailed. With amazing courage he held his own, and became to be respected by all, notwithstanding his original tenderfoot status.

Then, in the spring of 1889 he was appointed Civil Service Commissioner by President Benjamin Harrison, after having been defeated as a Republican candidate for mayor by Abram S. Hewitt, his Democratic opponent. He served, under Harrison, 4 years as Civil Service Commissioner; and thereupon he continued in this post 2 years under President Cleveland; and he says of this tenure that he was treated with the utmost consideration by both Presidents. During his 6 years as such Commissioner he took the lead in greatly extending the scope of civil service, and certainly helped, in most substantial manner, the cause of civil service reform. Constantly he had to fight spoilsmen of power in both the great political parties.

In the spring of 1895, by William L. Strong, of New York, a reform mayor, he was appointed police commissioner, and in that capacity served for 2 years in the newly elected reform administration. He immediately began the task of curbing the graft and favoritism long practiced in the police department, and again against entrenched odds, he brought about a vast improvement in the police system.

The year 1897 witnessed his appointment, by President McKinley, as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and in that role he signally distinguished himself in helping to strengthen the Navy, and in choosing Admiral Dewey for the command of our fleet in the Pacific area, with instructions to act—in case of the outbreak of the war with Spain, as was generally expected—and to attack and destroy the Spanish fleet in the Philippine waters, which later was brilliantly accomplished.

Always he was preaching the gospel of preparedness. When the war came, he felt so strongly that he should be a soldier in arms that he and Leonard Wood in 1898 took steps to organize what was designated as the 1st U.S. Volunteer Cavalry, made up of various types of men, but which became known as the Rough Rider Regiment, or the Rough Riders; this because of the hard-riding, straight-shooting contingent that distinguished it in public estimation. Wood, who had the benefit of some military experience in Indian campaigns, was made colonel of the regiment and Theodore Roosevelt, lieutenant colonel. The latter resigned as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and assumed his command. In due course the regiment entered into the Cuban campaign, and promptly engaged in action which culminated in July 1898 with the charge and capture, with Roosevelt in immediate command, of San Juan Hill. In these military exploits he proved himself as a man of great courage, ardor, and resourcefulness. The successes obtained by himself and the regiment electrified our Nation, and the Rough Riders became the most glamorous unit in the war. Colonel Roosevelt, himself, became a war hero.

Then followed his nomination by his party for the governorship of New York; and his election in November 1898. In that capacity he fought the same kind of fight for betterment that he had waged previously as a public official. Again he had to meet, customarily, the opposition of the two great political machines of New York; and again he won, through the support of the public to which he appealed, most of these battles. He grew in national esteem and strength. Through the desire of the leaders of his own party organization, who wished to ease him out of the Governor's chair, and because there was a nationwide demand of his party that he be nominated for Vice President, he was, in 1900, so nominated, to run with McKinley, a candidate for reelection. The McKinley ticket won the election by a substantial margin, and he became Vice President.

The tragedy at Buffalo soon followed, and in September 1901 President McKinley was slain by the bullet of an assassin, and Theodore Roosevelt became President. After serving out the term, he was renominated and reelected. This was in 1904.

During his incumbency in the White House he pursued the same general course he had always pursued with respect to public questions. He became a "trust buster," the effective friend of international peace, and a continuing social reformer, conservationist, and civil service advocate. He won the Nobel Prize for his efforts for peace. His fame and prestige encompassed the globe. He sent the American fleet around the world, and America's standing was enhanced. He arranged for the construction, by the United States, of the Panama Canal and sped the work to the point of assured success. This was his greatest single achievement. Many other things of the first order marked his 7 years as President, but they cannot be all recounted here. They are well known to all.

At the conclusion of his service as President, he retired, having refused to consider renomination for another term. He espoused the candidacy of Secretary Taft, and in 1908 the latter was elected to succeed him. He went to Africa on his famed safari, and there in big game hunts showed his skill, courage, and daring. Always he exhibited great physical prowess, whether in the bad lands, or in the campaign in Cuba, or under the attack of the would-be assassin in his 1912 campaign. Then there followed the break with President Taft, and the Bull Moose party, with his nomination for the Presidency in 1912, in opposition to Mr. Taft. Then the defeat of both of them, and the election of Woodrow Wilson, the Democratic candidate. Next came World War I with his four sons marching forth to battle, and the loss of Quentin. He had instilled into the boys the idea of duty of citizens to be soldiers in time of conflict, and they acted without hesitation. He became writer, editor, and the tireless advocate for causes that he believed to be just. His efforts to be made a commanding officer in World War I failed, greatly to his disappointment. Later his old thirst for adventure, for exploration, revived. He organized a party, his son, Kermit, with him, to make a tour through the terrible jungles of Brazil, to solve the mystery as to the River of Doubt; and he solved it; and the river was renamed for him. During this fearful adventure he sustained severe injuries and incurred a fever that almost took his life. Never afterwards was he free from pain, and he finally passed away on the 6th day of January 1919. His last words were to his faithful colored valet, "Please put out that light."

His burial in a local Oyster Bay cemetery followed.

I cannot agree with the suggestion, often made, that Theodore Roosevelt was not a man of innate genius; that he was but possessed of ordinary qualities, greatly cultivated and applied. I believe that he had, in very large degree, a genius for public affairs, that was utilized by him for the general good. I am sure that he carried within himself a genius, as well as a passion—to serve wisely and well—the masses of his fellow citizens, and to this end he also had the genius for achieving close contact with the general public and to make of its members devoted friends and helpers. I consider that his was the genius, also, of leadership, without which his dreams of useful and highly effective service would have counted for naught. Genius, with these facets, may not be of the type possessed by a great astronomer, an eminent philosopher, a supreme artist, and others who have mounted to eminence in their respective fields; but the kinds of genius which distinguished Theodore Roosevelt united to make of him a great and successful leader in the most difficult of all areas of endeavor, that of the art of governing wisely and effectively. Thus, no accident or favoritism took place when he was selected for dramatic depiction on the mighty cliff in the Bad Lands, in companionship with other universally accepted Presidents, as of the first magnitude, Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

It has been said, in one or another form, that the history of any people or country, is the story of the lives of its great men; and I would add, if you please, also, of its great women. In the light of this saying, it may be declared that the story of the life and achievements of Theodore Roosevelt is, in very large measure, the history of the United States during his era.

Theodore Roosevelt was an intense American, and he loved his country and its institutions, with unsurpassed ardor. In consequence, he did not have any patience with a polygot or hyphenated Americanism; especially in the time of national peril. Regardless of whether one might be of native or foreign birth, he was forthright and forceful in his views that each and every one enjoying the liberties and benefits derived through American citizenship, owed unfailing loyalty and devotion to the Nation's Constitution and flag; and that no lingering sentiment for any foreign land should interfere. He preached with tremendous power the gospel of Americanism. He believed, of course, that every citizen of an alien land of freedom should be loyal thereto; that a patriotic citizen of one free nation would serve freemen everywhere. He dramatized the United States of America as perhaps no other President ever dramatized it. In outstanding measure he vitalized the Nation's potential energies, its visions, hopes, and aspirations. During his more active life he seemed to be the articulate voice of America. He loved the other nations of the hemisphere and was ever ready to aid—and, if needs be, to defend them. Indeed, his sturdy and robust Americanism should prove of the highest exemplary value to generations to come.

Once fronted in the right direction, Theodore Roosevelt, with untiring and resistless energy, and ofttimes against seemingly impossible odds, strove for the accomplishment of a great tasks for the public weal. Witness, for examples, his fight in the General Assembly of New York, as a member in those early days of his political life, for measures of reform; his years of labor, as a Civil Service Commissioner of his country, whereby he, more than anyone else, laid the foundations for a true, and all-embracing civil service system; his work as Police Commissioner of New York through which, in something like 2 years, the police conditions of graft and alliance with crime were changed to a situation of law enforcement and the divorcement of police action from political considerations; his bold and effective labors as Assistant Secretary of the Navy that strengthened our naval establishment, and the selection of Admiral Dewey to lead the naval forces in the Pacific, with the resulting destruction of the Pacific Spanish Fleet in the Spanish-American War, whereby was won the liberation of Cuba; the enforcement of the antitrust laws; his effective efforts for conservation of our country's national resources; and the upbuilding of the national park and monument system. The enumeration of all his worthwhile achievements seems to be a task impossible of performance. There was his work in bringing about the settlement of the Russo-Japanese war, followed by his receipt of the Nobel Prize; his settlement of the coal strike and the Alaskan boundary question; his forceful action which precluded the Kaiser's attack on Venezuela, and the adjustment of the issue involved by methods of peace; his influence exerted successfully for the composition, without war, of the controversy between France and Germany; his strenuous, but successful efforts to curb the great trusts of the Nation. With sturdy health and strength, he seemed to thrive on the battles he had to fight with respect to most of his achievements. Like the ships of the sky he rose against the wind, and flew to his goal. He appeared to love a fight, and never lowered his guard because of dangerous antagonism. He met challenge with dauntless courage, and as the people's champion and relying on their understanding and support, was most successful in encompassing the ends he sought. He was a practical idealist who knew the rules of the game.

During his official career he preached the doctrine of the Square Deal which, after all, is the Best Deal. He sought to treat labor and capital justly, but without discrimination. Not only did he curb the trusts, but he did not hesitate to oppose labor leadership when he believed it to be in the wrong. A friend of labor while Governor, he promptly used the military power of the State of New York to stop rioting and bloodshed in the Croton Aqueduct and Buffalo strikes.

Speaking of his 3 years of service in the Legislature of New York and his unsuccessful fight for its speakership, he said:

"If I wished to accomplish anything for the country, my business was to combine efficiency with decency; to be a thoroughly practical man of high ideals who did his best to reduce the ideals to actual practice. This was my ideal, and to the best of my ability I strove to live up to it."

On the subject of labor and wealth, he said:

"The only kinds of courage and honesty which are permanently useful to good institutions anywhere are those shown by men who decide all cases with impartial justice, on grounds of conduct, and not on grounds of fact."

He was a sturdy optimist, a prophet of the future and courageous challenger of oppressive practices and tendencies in the industrial world.

Step by step, and battle by battle, he was compelled to march and fight through the political maze of his time until he won—as he usually did—the solution of grave economic problems.

The assassination of President McKinley made Theodore Roosevelt his successor at the age of 47, the youngest President the country has ever known.

Undoubtedly, he was the most dynamic and versatile President our country has ever had; one of the most picturesque; and the one with the widest range of information, and the most prolific writer. Also, he had the broadest contacts, and was at home with more varied ranks of the social order than any other occupant of the Presidential chair. He was experienced in the camp and familiar with the hardships and stresses of soldier life; at ease in the halls and drawing rooms of art and culture; congenial and happy in the libraries and the most diverse circles of authorship; thrilled by the rough life of cowboys and the cattle range; learned in the fields of the natural sciences; expert in the areas of exploration and travel through the perilous regions of the earth, and in the dangerous domains of big game, where the steady nerve, quick judgment, and skilled shot, and a courage that defied death itself, were necessary for survival.

He was wont to quote the old Boer maxim, "Speak softly and carry a big stick." He was intrigued with this sentiment—not only for its good sense in a world of struggle, but also because of its touch of humor.

Theodore Roosevelt was our first great conservation President, and with effective zeal he preached its gospel throughout the years. He had to fight powerful, selfish elements in this connection, but he did more to advance the conservation of our natural resources, and to inculcate in the minds of the people the indispensable need for such a policy, than any other Chief Executive.

Much he did to build up our naval strength; and he was wise enough and strong enough to do ever so much for driving home to our people the need for preparedness to the end that we might, not only bring and keep our Nation in the focus of respect by the other nations, but if need be, wage war for the protection of the weak and oppressed, as in the case of Cuba.

Anyone who contemplates the varied and successful activities of Theodore Roosevelt must marvel at his unprecedented versatility. As naturalist, explorer, traveler, big-game hunter, rancher, soldier, scholar, author, social reformer, and statesman, he was singularly successful. He was an idealist, but not one of the Pollyanna type. He was, withal, wise and practical; and, therefore, usually successful—though ofttimes strongly, not to say violently, opposed.

Theodore Roosevelt was a man of the finest moral integrity. His was a Christian home. He was a model of domestic demeanor, of conjugal fidelity, of affection and companionship for his children; and he never walked with a "moral" limp. In these connections, his life and home constituted the most splendid examples for the American people to emulate. Our Nation was founded on the Christian home; the Mayflower, pilgrimage, the Plymouth Colonies, and the others of that early day of our American history, established the ideals of domestic and public integrity, of civil and religious liberty on which our colonies were based and sustained, the seminal seed which grew and ripened into the mighty Nation we have today, with its institutions of freedom—indeed, a light unto the world.

In eminent degree, our Theodore possessed the "common touch" and thus, in every walk of life, he was a popular hero; and in every section of society he made and held friends with the proverbial bonds of steel. The so-called "masses" held him in affectionate regard and zealously followed his leadership. To them he was not "Colonel Roosevelt" nor "Mr. Roosevelt," nor "the President," he was "Teddy" and "T. R." With the exception of Lincoln, I believe that no American President was ever closeer to the people than was he. The language of all he spoke; by all he was understood.

His political opponents and critics severely criticized him for his attitude on preparedness, and his insistence on adequate military strength. He did not wish his Nation to bully the other nations, but he did desire that his own country should be and remain strong enough to prevent others from the attempt to bully it. His enemies and critics made much of his "soft-speech" and "big-stick" utterances, and labeled him as reckless and a warmonger. This brings to mind the criticisms of Old Hickory, Andrew Jackson, the iron soldier of his day. Many feared that his elevation to the Presidency would bring conflict—and, possibly, war with foreign nations. Daniel Webster visited Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and twice President of the United States, at the famous home of the latter, Monticello, near Charlottesville, Va. This was in the closing years of Jefferson's life. Each had forgotten political differences, and they met with mutual respect and esteem. Webster recorded that in the course of their conversations, Jefferson said that he was fearful that, if Jackson ever came to the Presidency, his violent temper and intense prejudices might cause him to exercise his great powers with such rashness as to bring grave injury to the Nation; that he had observed Jackson as a U.S. Senator, and had often seen him literally choke with a violence of feeling whenever any fellow Senator said anything on the Senate floor that excited his wrath. Afterward, Jackson was twice elected to the Presidency but, said Webster, contrary to the fears and predictions of breaches in our foreign relations, Jackson acted with unexpected prudence and conservatism, though never with a surrender of American rights. The very fact that he had been a successful soldier, and it was well understood that American rights would be fully upheld at any and all times, had the effect of causing foreign nations to deal with his administration with a commendable prudence. By the same token, foreign rulers knew that Theodore Roosevelt, as President, would promptly act to maintain the rights and honor of his country and, accordingly, avoided situations which would undoubtedly have occurred if a weaker man had been at the helm of the ship of state. Thus, his prestige abroad was so great that the German warships kept away from Venezuelan waters, and also out of the Mediterranean Sea, and Russia and Japan made peace at Portsmouth.

Touching the policy and attitude of President Theodore Roosevelt with respect to the independence of Panama, and the building of the canal, it may be sufficient to say that, in all he did with regard to the independence of Panama and the launching of this mighty isthmian enterprise, was done in good conscience, and with the purpose in mind to serve not only the best interests of the people of Panama who, under the circumstances involved, were entitled to freedom with the assurance that the canal would be built here; but, as well, to serve the best interests of his own country and the world at large. The results that followed, I am sure, justify all that the patriotic leaders of Panama did in that connection, and all that he did; and I doubt not that impartial history will so record. To him and to his associates in leadership, and to the Panamanian leaders in making the fateful decisions of that early time, this vast instrument of commerce and good will constitutes a monument which attests the worth and wisdom of their actions. Opportunity may knock once, it never importunes; and had not these grave steps been taken as they were, there might not have eventuated the Panama Canal, as destiny had certainly designed.

Theodore Roosevelt, as President, visited the isthmus in November 1906, and it must be considered as a very happy choice of the planners of this program of celebration here to have it coincide, in date, with the period of that visit. He went into Panamanian territory, and with Panama's first President, Dr. Amador, addressed the people of Panama

City. He was the first of the Presidents of the United States to visit foreign soil. Everywhere on the isthmus he was highly acclaimed. He made a grassroots study of the canal work and problems, and there followed his comprehensive report to Congress, and his conclusions, which were of optimistic character. He came away from the isthmus firm in his belief that the canal would be built. Colonel Gorgas was proceeding well with the prerequisite job of ridding the isthmus of yellow fever and in reducing malaria—then twin plagues of the isthmian region. John F. Stevens, then chief engineer of the project, was working with his accustomed celerity and efficiency in creating the indispensable organization required. The value of Steven's decisions in planning the major features of the canal was attested by the fact of their approval by President Roosevelt and the Congress, and the recorded judgment of the outstanding engineers who continued the work after his departure. One of the best and wisest of policies was that of his wholehearted support of the sanitary labors of Colonel Gorgas, a decision which, at a critical moment in canal history, was made by President Theodore Roosevelt. Had Colonel Gorgas not been upheld, the result would have been disastrous.

Reverting a moment to the independence movement of 1903, I may say that its leaders were men of courage, vision, and character. It was my privilege to know the greater number of them, and my judgment is thus derived. I have ever regarded them as close and dear friends, but they are no more. Some served in important official capacities in their government during my isthmian tenure, and I may state, in this general connection, that a part of my official duties was to represent the Isthmian Canal Commission in all its relations with the Panamanian Government and the foreign representatives accredited to that government; and that there was never a request that I submitted for the consideration of Panamanian authorities that was not promptly considered and granted. Such wholehearted cooperation was of the greatest importance to the canal enterprise—especially in the matters of health and sanitation.

On the occasion of that visit of President Theodore, he made an impromptu, but most inspiring address to the employees assembled at Culebra and elsewhere. What he said had a magical effect, and those hearing it, together with others who learned of it, received new courage and inspiration for their tasks. Undoubtedly, his action which resulted in the building of the canal, was one of the outstanding achievements of his Presidency, and by him was so regarded—and of which he was justly proud. Not only was it his most dramatic accomplishment but, perhaps, his most beneficial one.

Theodore Roosevelt was a prolific and talented writer. In connection with his labor in writing his interesting history, the "Winning of the West," I recall the fact that he came to my home city of Louisville in Kentucky years ago, and spent considerable time in the library of the widely famed Filson Club, and procured invaluable information there—particularly that which pertained to the conquest of the famous Northwest Territory under the heroic leadership of George Rogers Clark, a Virginia-Kentuckian. On that visit he made many lasting Kentucky friends, who were attracted by his vigor and unique personality.

As to the parting of the ways of Taft and Roosevelt in 1912, no time is permitted for any detailed discussion of this tragic incident in the lives of these two men of great abilities, each motivated by his conception of duty, each mindful of the national welfare. President Taft was a jurist of distinction, and afterward was Chief Justice of the United States. He had performed outstanding service as Governor General of the Philippines, and as Secretary of War in President Theodore's Cabinet, and had especially distinguished himself as the overall administrator of the building of the Panama Canal.

It was, indeed, distressing to see close personal relationships disturbed and torn asunder; and as already stated, the resulting campaign of 1912 brought their joint defeat for the Presidency. I have always thought the differences of temperament and methods of action were largely responsible for this situation. The one was deliberate and judicial in his consideration of public matters, and the other was dynamic and aggressive; and the ex-President thought that the President, a beneficiary of his powerful aid, was indifferent or hostile to the Theodore Roosevelt policies; and thus the break came. Both were able Presidents; and both wrote their names imperishably in the annals of the Panama Canal.

As the after years wore on, and the asperities were tempered, the two again became friends—maybe not friends as they were before, of the Jonathan and David, and Damon and Pythias type—yet friends, with the removal of causes for controversy, and lighted anew with the aura of the old companionship; and once again swayed by the memory of all the best and dearest that had gone before. Historian Hagedorn, who is in a position to speak with authority, tells me that, when Mr. Taft attended the funeral of Theodore Roosevelt, a newspaperman, then present, returned to the graveside after the last ceremonies were performed and found there, Mr. Taft, standing alone and in tears.

Where there is so much of eulogy, is there any thought of fallibility? Of course, there is. Theodore Roosevelt was no exception to what is universal. All men make mistakes, however wise and good they may be. He made mistakes; he sometimes erred in judgment and aim, just as was true of Washington, Lincoln, and others accounted great in American history. But, like these, his general purposes and achievements were for peace, progress, and the general good; and in these fields he wrought mightily and well. Usually time deals gently with those who have greatly achieved. The practice of posterity is to glorify the achievements of worth and to forget the errors which are accounted incidental and not truly germane. Men and women are thus judged by their best; and this is as it should be. Usually the mistakes they may make in their imperfect judgment, or in their dealings with the grim and realistic struggles of life pale to nothingness in the light of worthwhile deeds rendered by them, as truly consecrated leaders, devoted to the ideals of betterment for the human race. Thus judged, Theodore Roosevelt—our most versatile and dynamic President—stands indeed very high in the ranks of great Americans, and his light will shine on through the long reaches of the years to come.

Finally, permit me to suggest that, in this isthmian land—hallowed and consecrated by the touch of Columbus and Bolivar—which felt, and must always feel, the force and impact of the great and fateful decisions made by Theodore Roosevelt with respect to the canal, it seems that his spirit is ever present and brooding. To each and every one who made contributions to the success of the great isthmian enterprise, the thanks of all are due—and there is glory enough for all—but, as to him—because of the key position of strength and authority he held, and utilized—it is the general judgment that his name, like that of Abou ben Adhem, has "led all the rest."

FROM THE FARMER'S POINT OF VIEW

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. McGOVERN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, writing to his friend, John Jay, in 1785, Thomas Jefferson observed that—

> Cultivators of the earth are the most valuable citizens. They are the most vigorous, the most independent, the most virtuous, and they are tied to their country, and wedded to its liberty and interests, by the most lasting bonds.

The faith of Jefferson in the American farmer was a basic tenet in the philosophy of this great architect of American democracy. Yet, from that day to this the farmer has been faced with hazards and hardships that have required all the courage, patience, and skill that he could muster. The exploits of the frontier scout, the trapper, and the cowboy have been told a thousand times, but the most significant story of the frontier is the saga of the strong men and patient women who cleared the land, broke the prairie and braved the elements to erect the greatest agricultural economy in the history of the world. Some day I hope to have the time to write that story with its mingled heartache and joy.

Life on the farm is deeply satisfying in many respects. The joy of working with the soil and bringing a crop to harvest, or livestock, dairy products, and poultry to market is a satisfying experience. There is a social and spiritual quality about life close to the land that has played a larger part in the development of American institutions than we can fully grasp.

But there is also disappointment for the farmer—drought, insect invasions, hailstorms, glutted markets, and uncertain prices. The farmer is always at the mercy of cruel shifts in the elements that can destroy his production, sometimes in a matter of hours. When he does bring in a bountiful harvest, he is thrown into a market in which more often than not he is at the mercy of the buyer and the speculator. When he goes to town to buy the things that he needs, he asks "How much does this article cost?" But when he takes his produce to town to sell, he must ask "How much are you paying today?"

I remember as a small boy in South Dakota seeing the discouraged faces of farmers who year after year watched their crops wither from the drought or be devoured by grasshoppers. There were times when the only feed available for cattle was the tumble weed. Vivid memories of my childhood are tumbleweeds rolling across windswept prairies sometimes accompanied by dust storms that filled the air with fine topsoil until the noonday sky became black as midnight.

I remember, too, discovering that even strong men can cry. It was the day I heard a farmer friend of my father's explain that the check he had received in payment for his hogs was just large enough to pay the trucker for hauling them to market. I made up my mind then as a boy of 12 that this was an injustice that must some day be righted. It has always seemed to me that the farmer, who works harder than any of the rest of us and against greater odds, is entitled to strong and enthusiastic representation in the halls of government and in the public forum. The farmer is too involved in the day-by-day demands of farm management and hard labor to publicize his own needs and problems. Yet, there is a sense of loneliness in rural living that craves public expression.

Aside from the feeling of loneliness that comes from physical separation from life in the cities, the farmer has often felt that the great instruments of finance, government, and mass communication were passing him by. As one Midwest farmer recently put it:

> Ever call out across the prairie and feel nobody's listening? Well, it hurts to listen for somebody too hard. Hurts inside here. So we're lookin' all the time for somebody that's listening, lending us an ear.

It is true that radio, television, and improved press coverage have given the farmer better information on the world around him, but these improvements have not enhanced the farmer's capacity to talk back. The farmer who yearns to tell his story to the public cannot argue with the television screen or the news commentators. Certainly, much of what is said these days about the farmer cries out for answers—answers that ought to be made by men in high places with strong voices and clear minds.

Unfortunately, there are few voices such as Jefferson's who are championing the cause of the present day farmer. During the age in which Jefferson lived, 9 out of 10 Americans made their living in agriculture. Today the ratio of farmers to city dwellers is reversed with rural families comprising only a little better than 10 percent of the population of the United States. What is more, as the rural percentage of our population has declined, so have the number of public spokesmen who plead the farmer's case, and defend his interest.

Indeed, as one reads the big circulation magazines and listens to some of the farm critics on the floor of Congress, he wonders how the general public can possibly learn the truth about our agricultural problem. Even the Secretary of Agriculture who is supposed to lead the fight for the farmer in Washington seems to have enlisted on the side of the detractors rather than the defenders.

Typical of the slanted commentaries on the farm problem offered at the expense of the farmer was an editorial in the April 20, 1959, issue of Life magazine in which Life asked its readers if they were not getting fed up with a farm program that raised the price of bread and the shirts on our backs. The implication was that the farmer's share of the consumer dollar is too big.

This type of commentary is maddening to farmers who know very well that their slice of the consumer's food dollar has been steadily shrinking.

The facts are that 10 years ago the farmer was getting 50 cents of the housewife's food dollar; today he receives 38 cents. When Life talks about farmers raising the price of bread, they seem to forget that there is only about 2 cents worth of wheat in a loaf of bread. Furthermore, with wheat selling for 20 percent less than it did 10 years ago, bread is selling for 54 percent more.

To understand the irritation of farmers when they hear commentators blame them for the increased cost of food, one need simply remind himself of the fact that since 1952, farm prices have fallen 15 percent while retail food prices have gone up 5 percent.

In 1957, for example, the American people consumed 11 percent more farm-produced food than in 1952, but the farmers received $600 million less for that larger volume of food production. In painful contrast, food processors, shippers and other middlemen between the farm gate and the retail checkout counter received $6.1 billion more.

Little wonder then that farm families resent it when they are blamed for the high cost of living. Actually, the rising cost of living has hit the farmer harder than any other person because he has been caught in the middle of a cost-price squeeze. With the cost of everything he buys going up—machinery, parts, medical care, and so forth—and his own prices going down, the farmer justifiably feels that he is not sharing in the prosperity of the Nation.

Some time ago a young farmer from Britton, S. Dak., sent me a sample of a small screw that he purchased for the steering mechanism of his tractor. That little part no bigger than the end of his smallest finger cost $3. As he pointed out to me, it would take 3 bushels of corn, 7 bushels of oats, or 15 dozen eggs to pay for this tiny item. Farmers have a special reason to read with raised eyebrows the news stories of this summer reporting that United States Steel Corp. made a net profit of $255 million during the first half of the year, $119 million more than for the same period last year and a new high for the company.

Rural families do not resent business and labor making money because they know that unless these groups are prospering there will be no purchasers for the products of the farm and ranch. But they do feel that agriculture's share of the national income should be improved.

That this feeling on the part of the farmer is more than imagination is revealed in Government statistics showing that the per capita income of rural families is only half the national average. Since the end of World War II, most Americans have substantially increased their incomes, but the farmer has experienced a sharp income drop which with inflated costs has slashed his purchasing power by one-third.

Secretary Benson has suggested that the farmer's difficulty stems from his inefficiency. Actually, nothing could be further from the truth. During the last decade farmers have increased their efficiency—measured by output per man-hour—three times as much as workers in the rest of our economy.

The efficiency of the American farmer is the envy of the world, including the Kremlin which sent top experts to the United States to visit the farms of South Dakota, Iowa, and other States. Representing only slightly more than one-tenth of our population, farmers produce enough food to take care of our domestic and foreign needs and leave an ample surplus on hand. In striking contrast, half of the Russian people are engaged in agriculture and they still have been unable to produce much more than enough to feed the other half of the Russian people.

The sad fact is that the American farmer's efficiency has created much of our current farm problem—the problem of mounting farm surpluses. The Government's investment in farm surpluses is now approaching $10 billion with storage and handling charges expected to reach $1 billion annually. It is obvious that this tremendous outpouring of farm abundance will prove a burden both to farmers and to the taxpaying public unless it is more effectively used than at present.

What then can we do about the farm problem—the cost-price squeeze, low farm income, and mounting farm surpluses? It is safe to say that there is no easy solution to the problems of agriculture. Certainly, I have no quick and painless panacea to offer. Tomorrow, however, I expect to take the floor to point out what I believe are the weaknesses in the Benson farm policies and then go on to make some positive suggestions in the interest of an improved farm economy.

LABOR DAY 1959

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, today in New York City, a colorful parade is marching down Fifth Avenue. One hundred thousand working men and women, all members of the AFL–CIO, are proudly stepping out in a dedicated, happy resumption of a wonderful, meaningful old custom. One hundred bands and seventy colorful floats mark what unquestionably is one of the Nation's most impressive demonstrations of solidarity and pride in achievement.

While parades and demonstrations are signifying this great day in many other sections of the United States as well, the spectacular display in New York is, significantly, the first of its kind in 20 years. The last such parade was held in 1939. The intervention of the war years and the gradual drifting away from the custom were responsible for the abandonment of the parade in the city.

With the lapse of the parade, and with similar waivering of overt demonstrations in other cities and towns, Labor Day was beginning to lose its true significance. It was a day that America began taking for granted. For too many Americans the day had come to mean little more than a day off, the last fling to mark the end of summer, the time when families trek back from vacation, the beginning of a new school year.

But going back to first principles, Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City Central Labor Council, remembered the spirit in which the day was founded.

Thanks to him and to the New York City Central Labor Council the parade has returned to New York City. Now organized labor of this great city is given the opportunity once again to display its dedication to the theme of this historic day—a theme which Mr. Van Arsdale so aptly applied to the parade—"a strong, free labor movement means a strong, free America."

It is a theme that 100,000 men and women joined in today. They represented the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations ranging in skills from acting to welding.

This was truly a dedication of labor unity and pride in its role in the Nation's economic and social life. It was echoed in cities, in towns, in villages throughout the breadth of our land in many forms—parades, meetings, services, statements, articles, and other means of public expression.

Let us hope in the years to come, more observance, more dedication, more respect for this day will be realized.

It follows the truly spirit of the man who is recognized as the founder of Labor Day—Peter J. McGuire, whose inspiration gave rise to the observance of this day. He wrote:

> Pagan feasts and Christian observances have come down to us through the long ages. But it was reserved for the American people to give birth to Labor Day. In this they honor the toilers of the earth, and pay homage to those who from rude nature have delved and carved all the comfort and grandeur we behold.
> More than all, the thought, the conception, yea the very inspiration of this holiday came from men in the ranks of the working people—men active in uplifting their fellows, and leading them to better conditions.

Today marks the 77th anniversary of the first Labor Day. Labor truly has great reason for pride in accomplishment. It is not only the solid betterment in living conditions for so many Americans which labor has helped to achieve, but the strengthening of our democracy and the giving of deeper meaning to our incomparable individual rights—national acceptance of the belief that every man has the right to earn a living and provide for his loved ones under decent conditions—to receive a remuneration worthy of his efforts. These are rights of modern American man and labor's role in attaining them has been a magnificent one.

Our American civilization—for that matter, all civilization—has never seen an equal throughout all of history. The individual has been afforded greater significance and greater protection than in any other society. Labor has helped to make this possible. This is the real meaning of its march up Fifth Avenue, its parade on Main Street, its meetings and its tributes.

Because it has so great an importance for all Americans—and to the world—I want to join in this tribute to those who initiated the idea of Labor Day so many years ago, and, to those who have contributed so much through the years and to those who are now doing so much to transform the American dream into reality.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Congressman Moore To Tour District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARCH A. MOORE, JR.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, as this session of Congress draws to a close, we all are looking forward to an opportunity to return to our respective States and visit and talk with the people whom we have the honor to represent here in the Congress.

Inasmuch as the First Congressional District of West Virginia is only an hour's time from Washington by modern air travel, I have made every effort to spend as much time in my district even while the Congress was in session. This has permitted me to better help and assist the people in my district and has given me a better than average knowledge of conditions in West Virginia and how the folks back home feel on particular legislative issues. Also, throughout the session, I have maintained an office in the district to better serve my constituents, and I have made a great many personal appearances and speeches in the seven counties which I represent. However, the limited time which I have been able to spend in my district has not permitted me to travel about as much as I would like, and to talk with persons who have problems on which I, as their Congressman, might be of assistance. Consequently, I am looking forward to adjournment as a time when I might visit each community and hold regular office hours during which time persons might drop in to say hello or to sit down and discuss specific problems.

In preparation for these annual visits in each community, I have made arrangements for office space in various courthouses, post offices, and other civic buildings where it will be convenient to meet and privately discuss problems with individuals, who might want to see me. The following schedule has been arranged and in each instance the time shown is local time in the particular community:

Tuesday, September 29, Hancock County: 10 a.m. to 12 noon, courthouse, New Cumberland; 1 p.m. to 5 p.m., post office building, Weirton.

Wednesday, September 30, Brooke County: 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., courthouse, Wellsburg.

Thursday, October 1, Ohio County: 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., fourth floor, post office building, Wheeling.

Tuesday, October 6, Taylor County: 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., post office building, Grafton.

Wednesday, October 7, Marion County: 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., courthouse, Fairmont.

Thursday, October 8, Wetzel County: 9:30 a.m. to 12 noon, courthouse, New Martinsville; 1 p.m. to 4 p.m., city hall, Hundred.

Wednesday, October 14, Marion County: 9:30 a.m. to 12 noon, post office, Farmington; 1:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m., city hall, Rivesville.

Inasmuch as my district office is situated in Moundsville and is open to the general public 6 days a week, I have scheduled no courthouse visit for Moundsville but my constituents from that area are invited to present any problems they may have at any time to me personally in my district office.

These visits in the various cities and towns are as informal as we can possibly make them, and workers, businessmen, and housewives are urged to drop by for a chat. No appointments are necessary and all persons are welcome to come as "they are" to see and visit with their Congressman. I hope the tour this year will be as successful as it was last year when we had several hundred people each day stop by our "mobile" office to let me know their feelings on various matters.

As I have stated, my district office, located in the Mercantile Bank Building in Moundsville, is open 6 days a week to serve the residents of the First Congressional District. When I am out of the office on official business, there is always a competent member of my staff available to answer questions or assist persons with their problems. I always welcome having my friends call upon me whenever my services might be of particular assistance.

Public Works Projects

OF
HON. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in our consideration of the latest bill to appropriate funds for Federal public works projects, we have a graphic example of why our Presidents should be given "item veto" powers in appropriation bills.

The President has objected to some 67 new public works starts which will cost us more than $800 million over the years. These projects have not been eliminated from the bill proposed by the House Appropriations Committee and which is due for a vote on Tuesday.

It is in the interest of our Nation that the President have a means of eliminating objectionable projects from bills such as this one without killing funds for worthwhile projects at the same time. There is no way that these objectionable projects can be extracted without vetoing the whole bill.

Therefore, the President and Congress are faced with the prospect of killing a bill which contains many worthwhile projects or approving a bill which will cost our taxpayers a great deal of extra money.

All of us know that appropriations for new public works projects are deceptive. First-year engineering and construction costs for these projects are relatively small. It is in later years that Congress finds itself in the position of appropriating billions of dollars for projects which quite often should not have been attempted by the Federal Government in the first place.

Tax dollars are hard to come by. Let us save them and balance the budget now and in the future.

In the past 4 years, Congress has tacked on some 200 new projects over and above those projects provided for in the budget. These new starts are going to cost our people some $3,800 million before they are completed.

It would be wonderful if a Taj Mahal or a Great Wall of China could be constructed in every congressional district in our Nation so that each Member of Congress would have something tangible to which he could point with pride.

But this is one of those times in which Members of Congress should view with alarm.

It is my hope that those Members of Congress who find themselves in the very least embarrassed by this present predicament will keep in mind the necessity and the service to the American people which would result from item-veto powers for our Presidents, the vast majority of whom have sought such powers during the past half century.

These neatly wrapped, expensive packages which are presented to us by the Appropriations Committee unfortunately contain a great number of bad apples along with the good ones.

In rather a unique method, the House Appropriations Committee has come up with its newest solution to this problem.

Instead of eliminating the bad apples, we are asked to slice a 2½-percent chunk off all the apples in the package whether they are good or bad.

This novel approach to the public works program certainly would not meet with the approval of any housewife shopping at the grocery store. If such an alternative were presented to her and she were given no opportunity to eliminate the good from the bad, I believe that her decision would be to eliminate apples from her diet until such time as they were of better uniform quality and content.

The Sad Plight of the Migratory Worker Demands Immediate Congressional Action

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, the fall harvest is at hand, and nearly a half million migratory farm workers will begin their trek across the Nation. In the orchards and fields these workers will gather up nature's yield of a bountiful year.

It is truly a shame that these nomadic toilers are not provided with decent housing, wages, and transportation. In some sections of the country they work under considerably better conditions than in others and the wages are more adequate depending upon the location and type of harvest but certainly it cannot be denied that legislation is sorely needed to establish better minimum standards for these people who are frequently overcrowded in totally inadequate housing facilities with lack of beds and bedding and substandard sanitation facilities.

According to the report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor, some of these workers are required to sleep in the open, completely exposed to the elements. It is an undeniable fact that these workers are often packed into trucks by the hundreds like sardines for long trips from one area to another.

Tomorrow the Labor Department will conduct hearings which offers some ray of hope for improvement of these conditions and minimum standards for migratory workers.

While these folks choose this type of work and even the way of life it has traditionally required, the fact remains that without them, millions of dollars' worth of fruits and other crops would literally rot on the vine if they did not take to the open country each year.

Among the proposed regulations which will undoubtedly stem from the hearings along with the revelations of the President's Commission report will be: A regulation to provide through State public employment offices, adequate and sanitary housing before such agency will fill any request for workers. This, of course, would mean guarantees conforming to applicable housing and sanitary codes.

The State agencies will probably be required to make sure that pay offered will equal the prevailing rate in the area for similar jobs.

The prospective employer will probably be required to guarantee better transportation than is now provided.

Charging an invasion of States rights some farm State legislators challenge the authority of the Labor Department to implement such regulations. There may be a legal basis for their position. On the other hand, the Justice Department upholds the legality of the Federal Government to legislate standards of this nature. This might or might not be challenged where migratory workers would operate within a State and would not cross State lines in the course of their employment.

Regardless, this is a problem which the legislators can no longer ignore, and legislation at some level should and must be enacted to meet it squarely during the 86th Congress.

Distinguished Service to Agriculture Award to Senator Stuart Symington

OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I take pleasure in including a report of the ceremonies attending the award to Senator STUART SYMINGTON, of Missouri, made by the Missouri Farmers Association to Senator SYMINGTON, and notes from his address before the annual convention of the Association in acceptance of the award.

The Missouri association is the largest cooperative State association in the Nation and transacts a larger volume of business annually than any other State agricultural organization. The president of the Missouri Farmers Association, Mr. Fred V. Heinkel, is one of the outstanding agricultural executives of the Nation today.

Senator SYMINGTON before his election to the United States Senate had taken a deep interest in the development of the farm cooperatives of the State and during his service in the Senate has been recognized as an authority on agricultural legislation.

In conferring this distinguished honor upon Senator SYMINGTON at the annual State meeting of the Missouri Farmers Association in session at Columbia, Mo., on August 24, President Heinkel said:

Because of your distinguished record as U.S. Senator from Missouri, and as a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and because of your firm insistence on truth, honesty, and positive action as a member of that committee, because of your perfect 100-percent voting record on farm legislation while a Member of the U.S. Senate; and, further, because of your loyal support of REA, farmer cooperatives, soil and water conservation programs, forestry, and flood control; and because of your sincere interest in the health and well-being of the people of this Nation as a whole, and American farmers in particular, we feel that you have earned and are eminently deserving of the highest honor and award the Missouri Farmers Association has to offer.

Therefore, the board of directors of the Missouri Farmers Association has voted unanimously to bestow upon you the MFA's Award for Distinguished Service to Agriculture.

In response, Senator SYMINGTON said in accepting the distinguished award:

Mr. President, there must be unity in agriculture if we are to have prosperity in agriculture.

Nobody can deny that the American farmer is the forgotten man of our present economic recovery. The record proves that while other groups in our economy have moved forward from last year's recession, the American farmer has moved backward.

Part of that unfortunate record follows:

For the first 6 months of 1959, total national income is up 10 percent over 1958; but farm income is down 8 percent; in fact, parity today is the lowest in 19 years.

For the first time in our history, the farmer's share of the consumer's food dollar has sunk below 40 percent.

And as we all know, farmers' expenses are now at record levels.

The record is also clear in showing that the farm policies of this administration are pushing the farmer further toward the bottom of the economic heap. The farmer's share of the Nation's income has declined from 5.2 percent in 1952, to 3.2 percent so far in 1959, a reduction of about 40 percent in less than 7 years.

Unless our great Nation is satisfied with partial economic health, something must be done to bring farm income back to a fair return for work expended.

In addition to the income squeeze, the farmers of America now find themselves in the midst of one of the biggest administrative messes in the history of our Government.

The Government investment in farm commodities has increased from $2.5 billion in 1952, to $9 billion in 1959—and at the present rate of increase this investment will be over $12 billion by this time next year.

The resulting drain on taxpayers is tremendous, as witnessed by the fact the present Secretary of Agriculture has spent more money in his 6½ years in office than all the previous Secretaries of Agriculture in the history of our country.

Nevertheless Secretary Benson continues to reject congressional attempts to deal with this growing problem.

Of 124 agriculture bills introduced in the Senate, during his term of office, he has opposed all but 14.

Yet despite his promise to the Senate last February 16, Mr. Benson has yet to come up with any overall farm plan of his own.

As an interesting aside, note that processors of agriculture products are now making, in effect, comparable complaints against retailers that farmers have been making over recent years about processors.

If we don't stop this trend toward the vertical, soon a very few people will control it all—and this goes beyond agriculture.

FOOD-FOR-PEACE PLAN

Our agricultural abundance, instead of being an economic curse, can be used as a potent tool in our efforts to build world peace.

We should declare to the people of the world now plagued with hunger and starvation and disease and poverty that the people of the United States are willing to share our abundance—our blessings—of food and fiber.

REA

One of the greatest examples of the value of cooperation and unity in agriculture is in REA.

In 1935, less than 6 percent of our American farms had central station electric power.

Then the wheels of cooperation began to turn. Individual farmers, working hand in hand with their neighbors and with their Government, forged an organization and a network of powerlines which now provide more than 96 percent of our farms with the benefits of electric power.

But even with these outstanding achievements, we must continue to cooperate and unite against those who do not have the best interest of the farmer and REA at heart.

Some of these attacks come from the very people who are supposed to represent the American farmer.

I am glad to announce that, only last Friday, the Senate passed the Aiken resolution, which reaffirmed and restated the sense of Congress that REA shall continue to serve the American farmer.

Here again is the evidence of farmer cooperation through their representatives in Congress, to unite and cooperate to preserve this great institution.

UNITY IN AGRICULTURE

Perhaps this very meeting this week, here in Columbia, Mo., can stimulate wholehearted efforts on the part of farmers, farm leaders, and all of us interested in the future of agriculture, to unit—to speak as one voice.

I pledged my full support toward that goal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CHELF

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, we are all deeply saddened by the passing of our former colleague from Kentucky, Andrew Jackson May. "Uncle Jack," as he was affectionately known, served the good mountain people of Kentucky of the Seventh District, for seven terms. He was the chairman of the old Military Affairs Committee that had to do with the U.S. World War II effort.

I shall never forget that as a new and young Member of the House—back in January 1945—"Uncle Jack" had up before the House the Mobilization of Civilian Manpower—the commonly known work-or-fight bill. Having been retired from the Air Corps a short time before I was elected to Congress in 1944, "Uncle Jack" asked me if I would speak on his committee's bill. He said that it was in trouble. He told me that he thought if I would urge the membership to support the measure—that they would be inclined to do so—since I had just left the armed services. I did speak out on the bill. I took the position that if the Congress could draft a young boy to leave home, train, fight, and even die in the defense of his country—surely then the Congress had the power and the moral obligation to draft a man to work and to fashion the tools, the guns, and the munitions for him to use in his fighting. The bill passed the House and later "Uncle Jack" was kind enough to tell the newspapers that my speech in behalf of the legislation was the difference between victory and defeat of the bill.

Andrew J. May lived to be 84 years of age. He passed away quietly at the hospital in his hometown of Prestonsburg in his beloved Kentucky mountains.

Andrew J. May led nearly every fight for every major piece of legislation that gave our great country her strength, manpower, and her vast striking power during the war. He carried this terrible load of work and great responsibility all during the entire World War II period. Specifically, he piloted the draft bill and the GI bill of rights through the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, Andrew May should be remembered for the many, many good things that he did. As one of two members of the Kentucky delegation who served in the House of Representatives with "Uncle Jack"—I want to say that he was, in my opinion, kind, considerate, sympathetic, understanding, sober, and capable. He loved his home, his family, his people, and his State. May God rest his soul in peace.

To his family, I extend my deepest sympathy on this sad occasion, and may the good Lord bless them and keep them always.

Mr. Speaker, there follows excerpts from a story appearing in the New York Times of September 7, 1959:

ANDREW MAY DIES—EX-LEGISLATOR, 84

PRESTONSBURG, KY., September 6.—Andrew Jackson May, a power in Congress until war-bribe charges destroyed his career, died today in a hospital here. He was 84 years old.

Mr. May's wife, the former Julia Grace Mayo, died in the 1940's. They had three children, two of whom survive—Robert and Mrs. Olga May Latta, both of Prestonsburg.

ATTAINED PROMINENCE IN WAR

An obscure Representative from Kentucky until World War II, Mr. May gained national prominence as head of the powerful House Military Affairs Committee.

* * * * *

He had assumed that post in 1938, after having served in Congress since 1930.

* * * * *

In 1946, the Mead committee, headed by Senator James M. Mead, New York Democrat, began investigation of war contracts. * * * In a speech on the floor of the House, he branded the committee a court of inquisition, described Dr. Garsson as his "very good friend," and said that he had acted out of patriotism in aiding the syndicate.

* * * * *

Mr. May had once said that with a name like his (Andrew Jackson) he had to be a fighter. Ill and worn at 72, he fought hard at his trial to prove that he had never accepted money from the Garsson brothers and that he had not done favors for them that he would not have done for others.

* * * * *

On June 26, 1952, the Kentucky Court of Appeals restored Mr. May to his standing as a lawyer because it was "not in keeping with Christian principles" to deny him another chance. On December 25, 1952, former President Harry S. Truman granted a full Presidential pardon that restored his citizenship rights.

Since then Mr. May had lived in Prestonsburg, less than 15 miles from Langley, where he was born on June 24, 1875.

He began his career as a schoolteacher and later was admitted to the bar and entered politics. From 1901 to 1909, Mr. May was Floyd County attorney. He later was a special judge of the circuit court of Johnson and Martin Counties.

Entering business, Mr. May served as president of the Beaver Valley Coal Co. In 1930, he was elected to the 71st Congress. He was reelected successively until 1947.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of September 5, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

The importance of every vote was demonstrated when the House sustained the President's veto of a public works bill by just one vote. With a two-thirds majority needed to override, each vote to sustain equals, in effect, two votes. The President, bent on balancing our budget, asked for no new starts on projects this year. In this I wholeheartedly concur. Each Member, of course, defines fiscal responsibility his own way, and I was the only Texan to support the President's position on the final vote. Two hundred and seventy-four Members (263 Democrats and 11 Republicans) voted to override, and 138 (132 Republicans and 6 Democrats) to sustain. Starkly dramatic was the demand for a recapitulation, with the Speaker refusing Minority Leader HALLECK'S request for an announcement of the vote count before any recapitulation. Several vote switches could have been decisive. The one-vote margin means that each man among the 138 sustainers cast the deciding vote. The possibility of majority reprisals against the 138 became a topic of speculation. The Trinity survey funds were not deleted from the proposed substitute bill, though threatened. In all the political jockeying to take credit, or place blame, any real concern for sensible economizing is often lost.

The 1-cent gas tax increase debate was controversial, but generally not partisan. Argument centered around whether to (1) keep the program pay-as-we-go, by raising tax; (2) keep program at present high level of construction, or stretch it out; (3) dedicate more of highway user taxes to road fund. Everybody was for maintaining the highway program, one way or another. The President's proposal to boost the gas tax temporarily by 1½ cents per gallon was defeated, and a 1-cent increase agreed upon, plus earmarking other present user taxes for the highway fund. I opposed any tax increase (see July 25 and August 1 newsletters) believing that what we need is not more money, but more for our money. I feel we should check carefully into the still unexplained but soaring increases in cost estimates before increasing any taxes.

Another housing bill was vetoed and for practically the same reasons as before. The President has urged extension of FHA's insuring authority, and a slowdown or cutback in most other areas. The bill sent to him went far beyond budgeted figures in programs for college classroom construction loans, direct loans for additional housing for elderly persons, public housing, and urban renewal.

The Government interest rate ceiling brought on a heated debate, and probably this session's least understood one. The technical nature of the Treasury's debt-management problems, and the political appeal of being against "money lenders and their profits" helped muddy the water of fact and truth. Refinancing the national debt, and paying new bills run up by Congress, forces the Treasury Secretary to go into the open market and borrow under the best terms he can get. Yet he must do this under out-of-date Government-set interest rates for loans over 5 years. Unable to do so, he is forced to borrow for shorter terms, on which no such ceilings apply. Result? The Secretary is handicapped in trying to refinance on the best terms possible, and the Government is forced to compete with individuals, families, and small businesses for the short-term money available. The administration proposal to remove arbitrary interest restrictions on all Government borrowing was defeated, and only the interest ceilings on E- and H- (savings) bonds were removed. How the Treasury will refinance $85 billion of Government indebtedness during the next year was not faced up to, nor was the fact that the credit of the United States and the value of your currency is at stake. The present "political" interest ceilings will wind up costing John Doe Taxpayer much more. And the President has clearly warned that, if they refuse to act, the Democrat leadership in Congress will be responsible for the consequences.

The labor bill conference agreement, generally conforming to the stronger House bill, passed handily, 352–52. Only one Republican was among the 52 stanch labor supporters who opposed. While on labor affairs, two other items, appearing in the RECORD this week are worthy of note: (1) a quotation of Senator KENNEDY'S apt and honest description of his labor bill as "worked out carefully with President Meany and his lawyers" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 3, p. 18029, and (2) a résumé of Congress-threatening James B. Carey's past affiliations with Communist front organizations as well as his opposition to them upon occasion (RECORD, Aug. 31, p. 17460).

Another National Guard armory in Dallas was included in the military construction conference report adopted this week.

Khrushchev's visit opposition may at least prove to him that the American people are not taken in by his duplicity. It is my fervent hope and prayer that (1) he will sense the tremendous "sleeping giant" strength of the American people, so he will not miscalculate our ability and determination, (2) that more good than harm comes from his visit here. Khrushchev's visit is of grave concern to most here and ever present in the thoughts of many, despite preoccupation.

The President's Veto of the Housing Bill Brings Protest From the People at Home Who Realize What the Effect Will Be

OF
HON. JOHN J. McFALL
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. McFALL. Mr. Speaker, those of us who worked and voted for good housing legislation only to have the wishes of the majority thwarted by Presidential opposition three times in the past 2 years are understandably disturbed and disappointed.

But even more concerned are the people on the home front who are faced with the prospects of no housing legislation because of the veto.

I am hopeful that before we adjourn we will enact a new housing bill, as good or even better than the defeated bill of 1958, the trimmed down vetoed bill No. 1 of 1959 or the even further curtailed but still vetoed bill No. 2 of 1959.

Every person in the country is hurt if our housing program is stopped, not only the real estate salesmen, builders, carpenters, and suppliers who are direct effected by shutdown of the FHA program, but all the others who are indirectly hurt.

Following are telegraphic comments from some of those in the 11th District of California who know firsthand the harm that is being done by these vetoes:

From Dean C. DeCarli, mayor of Stockton:

The city of Stockton is extremely disappointed over the veto of the housing bill by the President. As this bill is needed to assist us in financing our West End redevelopment project to provide for a needed 200 units of public housing and to provide for Federal assistance for displaced people, we urgently request that you override the President's veto.

From John E. Hirten, executive director, Redevelopment Agency, city of Stockton:

Veto of housing bill will have serious effect on entire urban renewal and housing program for the city. Completely stops possibility of renewal and redevelopment of 200 acres West End skidrow area. Also kills 200 public housing units needed to replace obsolete city owned Lanham Act war housing. We appreciate your efforts in the past and once again implore your assistance to override the President's veto. Two years without appropriate housing legislation will certainly restrict our programs and hurt interest and initiative shown by citizens of this community. It can truthfully be said that the lack of housing legislation will have detrimental affects on our community and its economy. Of all legislation the housing bill comes closest to paying for itself in increased tax base of communities and their economy.

From C. P. Kenyon, administrator, San Joaquin County Board of Supervisors:

The President's veto of the housing bill affects several vital projects in San Joaquin County. We feel that the public housing bill should be passed and we urge your vote to override the President's veto.

From Henry Hansen, secretary of the Central Labor Council of Stockton:

Housing bill is vital to Stockton. Appreciate your support to override the veto.

From executive director of the San Joaquin County Housing Authority, Allen R. Reed:

Thank you for your letter of August 28 and your attached newsletter No. 34 on the subject of difficulty of enacting good housing legislation. We were both somewhat surprised and shocked when we learned of the President's veto of the second housing bill. All we can do at this time is to express our appreciation for your good work and await the outcome of the override action. In a telephone conversation with the Commissioners today they asked me to express their most heartfelt appreciation for your work and support of the housing bills.

Time To Curb Excessive Jet Noise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FLORENCE P. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 7, 1959

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, the price of material progress is sometimes too high in terms of its effects on the health, safety, and comfort of human beings. Such an instance appears to be the increasing concern felt by many at the impact of jet noise on the people who live in the vicinity of airports which service commercial jet aircraft.

This problem is especially important at the major airports in the New York metropolitan area, including the Newark Airport which is adjacent to the district I represent.

I was pleased, therefore, to note that a special subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce held a hearing today at New York's Idlewild International Airport for the purpose of inquiring into the situation. I am hopeful the subcommittee will be able to offer constructive ideas, for it is apparent that the Federal Government has at least a measure of responsibility for controlling the excesses of jet noise.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I include a brief item from the Sunday New York Times of September 6, which cites the particularly bad noise record of certain domestic airlines using jet aircraft in contrast to flag carriers of other nations. I also include a longer story from United Press International which appeared in the same issue of the New York Times, and which describes the growing concern throughout the country.

Finally, I include the text of a statement I prepared for the Interstate and Foreign Commerce subcommittee hearing in New York today.

The material follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 6, 1959]

AIRLINE CRITICIZED FOR JET NOISE HERE

Of five airlines operating jet planes out of New York International Airport, Idlewild, Queens, American Airlines is the only one in "willful disregard of the public welfare" by making noisy takeoffs, the port authority charged yesterday.

John R. Wiley, aviation director of the port authority, which operates the airport, said that American Airlines conformed to noise standards in only 64.3 percent of its takeoffs from Idlewild during August.

Trans World Airlines conformed on 68.3 percent of its takeoffs, he added, an improvement over its 59.6 percent conformance during July, but still "far below the acceptable level."

Pan American conformed 91.8 percent, while Aerolineas Argentinas and British Overseas Airways Corp. conformed on all their takeoffs.

There are 25 takeoffs of jet planes daily at Idlewild. Residents of the Jamaica Bay area have complained of noisy takeoffs and landings.

A public hearing into these complaints will be opened at 10 a.m. tomorrow on the fifth floor of the control tower at Idlewild by a House of Representatives subcommittee.

A spokesman for American Airlines said yesterday that his company was "following closely" the voluntary procedures for noise reduction set up by the National Air Transport Coordinating Committee. This organization consists of delegates from all domestic airlines, the pilots' union, and the Federal Aviation Agency.

[From the New York Times, Sept 6, 1959]

PROTESTS OVER JET NOISE MOUNT TO A NEW PITCH AROUND AIRPORTS—SLEEPLESS RESIDENTS SEEK FLIGHT CURBS—PROBLEM IS MOST ACUTE IN NEW YORK, SAN FRANCISCO, AND LOS ANGELES

WASHINGTON, September 5.—America's new jet airliners, conquerors of distance and time, are not doing so well with people on the ground.

Specifically, those irate citizens live near airports and complain vociferously that jet noises is interfering with life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

The airliners are frankly worried. The organized protests have reached such proportions that some citizens' groups are demanding a curfew on all jet landings and takeoffs between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. They have taken their fight to Congress and to the Federal Aviation Agency.

The chief trouble spots appear to be in New York, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. This is the situation in those three cities.

New York: John T. Clancy, Queens Borough president, is spearheading the opposition, directed mainly against jet operations at New York International Airport, Idlewild, Queens.

It was Mr. Clancy who proposed that no jet landings or takeoffs be permitted at Idlewild during sleeping hours—and he would extend that curfew even to LaGuardia Airport, which has no jet service. He also has threatened to start sewer construction projects in Queens that would block traffic into both airports.

San Francisco: San Francisco's International Airport is surrounded on three sides by the bay, and annoyance is limited to one residential area—the city of South San Francisco with a population of 40,000.

For more than a year this community has had an antinoise committee that holds frequent meetings. It even hired a noise expert.

SCHOOLS PROTEST

The complaints center around more than loss of sleep. The South San Francisco school district has at least twelve schools directly under the takeoff pattern, and school officials are considering legal action to keep jet noise from interrupting classes. So loud and frequent have been the complaints that a special telephone had to be installed at the airport to handle them.

Los Angeles: Several local groups from areas near Los Angeles International Airport have formed antinoise committees without getting much more than sympathy.

One school has filed complaints that classes have been stopped by noise. A single rally drew more than 1,000 persons, but the protesting committees have backed away from a proposal to move the airport itself; too many people, including some of the complainants, make their living at the airport.

COMMITTEE FORMED

A group called the Los Angeles Sound Abatement Coordinating Committee has been formed, with the aid of the airlines, Government, and airport officials.

What can be done about the noise problem? The question was put to pilots, the Federal Aviation Agency and the airlines themselves. Their unhappy but unanimous answer: Not an awful lot, for these reasons:

The jets are equipped with sound suppressors (at a cost of $25,000 per plane), but, while they reduce noise to a certain extent, a lot more work must be done in this field.

The FAA, the airlines, and the pilots put safety ahead of noise nuisance. Whenever possible, they try to use preferential runways that avoid settled areas.

RUNWAYS LIMITED

But the preferential runway solution is limited by the low number of such runways. Most airports have only one, and it is not always possible to use it. Under most conditions, particularly hot weather, jets must use the longest runway and this is not always the preferential one.

Some complaining city officials have insisted that pilots climb faster to reduce the noise problem. Pilots already are instructed to attain at least 1,200 feet of altitude as quickly as possible and also hold that altitude as long as possible before landing. Any faster climb than that is impossible under the existing air traffic control situation.

Such drastic solutions as a night curfew would wreck the airlines. For example, suspending all flight operations in New York from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. would mean that no New York-bound flight could leave Los Angeles after 2:30 p.m. Pacific coast time.

The Federal Aviation Agency is sturdily resisting demands that it take action to reduce noise annoyances. It is convinced not much could be done at present unless the protesting groups wanted to ruin commercial aviation and it believes the noise problem must be settled largely on a community level, not by the Federal Government.

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE FLORENCE P. DWYER, SIXTH DISTRICT, NEW JERSEY, BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE CONCERNING THE OPERATION OF COMMERCIAL JET AIRCRAFT AT AIRPORTS IN THE NEW YORK METROPOLITAN AREA, SEPTEMBER 7, 1959, AT THE NEW YORK INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I appreciate the opportunity of presenting this statement for your consideration. The problems related to the operation of commercial jet aircraft from the three major airports in the metropolitan New York area—that is, Idlewild, LaGuardia, and Newark Airports—are of intense and increasing concern to the people who live in the areas surrounding these airports.

As the Representative of the Sixth Congressional District of New Jersey, a portion of which lies adjacent to the Newark Airport, I am concerned for the health and safety and comfort of a great many of my constituents, all of which are jeopardized by the frequent use by jet aircraft of Newark Airport.

I hope that the subcommittee, in considering these problems, will give equal attention to all three airports. The problems are the same in each; all three airports serve the same area; all three are operated by the same Port of New York Authority; and, as the subcommittee is aware, Newark Airport has been utilized, more and more often, as a supplemental airport for traffic originally scheduled for Idlewild and LaGuardia when these airports are unable to handle them adequately.

Before any of the substantive problems can be solved, it seems to me, there is a fundamental need to fix responsibility among the several agencies involved with commercial aviation in this area, to determine the specific jurisdiction and the extent of authority which each is assigned. I refer, of course, to the Federal Aviation Agency, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Port of New York Authority, and the voluntary National Air Transport Coordinating Committee. In my own experience and in that of other Members of Congress, there has been in recent years a great deal of ambiguity and confusion and avoidance of responsibility whenever efforts are made to control the operation of aircraft in the area in the interests of the general public.

Specifically, I believe that Congress must determine what agencies have effective authority to impose necessary conditions upon the operation of aircraft, both in the air and on the ground, in order to restrict noise and otherwise provide for the safety and health and reasonable comfort of those who reside in the vicinity of the airports. If sufficient authority has not been granted to date, then I believe further that Congress should undertake the responsibility of assigning it—in clear and specific terms.

For these reasons, I have supported House Resolution 162, introduced by our colleague, Mr. BOSCH, of New York, which would establish a select committee to study these problems. However, in the event this subcommittee, with its extensive background of experience in the field, would be willing to undertake such a study, then I should be among the first to encourage you to do so.

Certainly, the seriousness of the noise problem justifies your attention. As part of its noise reduction procedure for jet aircraft, the Port of New York Authority set a maximum level of 112 perceived noise decibels. While this level is extremely liberal when compared with the 60 decibels level which medical and acoustical authorities have recommended for the hours from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m., even this high level has been frequently exceeded by aircraft operating out of New York area airports.

Levels, for instance, of 124 decibels and 129 decibels have been verified by the Port of New York Authority as having been reached by jet aircraft operating in the area within the past 2 months. In understanding these figures, please remember that 140 decibels represents the very top of the sound scale, that physical pain will be experienced at sound levels above 130 decibels, and that a level of 108 decibels (substantially below the maximum set by the Port of New York Authority) is the equivalent of the noise produced by 30 Niagara Falls roaring simultaneously.

It is obvious that exposure to constant noise disturbances of these magnitudes will seriously affect the health and comfort of people living in the area over which jet aircraft must operate flying in and flying out of New York airports.

A section of Elizabeth, N.J., called Elizabethport, is situated within 1 mile of the most heavily utilized runway at Newark Airport. This is the runway, you will recall, which was specially built following three successive crashes of aircraft operating out of the Newark Airport in a very small section of Elizabeth. Planes which land or take off from this runway in a southerly direction fly over the Elizabethport section at levels below 400 feet—considerably lower than even the most liberal permissible minimum altitude.

Despite the past assurances of Port of New York Authority officials, these aircraft increasingly are jet aircraft, since jets have recently been permitted to use Newark Airport as an alternative to Idlewild and LaGuardia. On recent evenings, as many as five huge jet transports have thundered over this residential section of Elizabeth at incredibly low altitudes. The effect on the population has been upsetting and disturbing in the extreme. One of my constituents, for example, has been forced to replace no less than nine ceilings during the past few years as a result of the physical shock of the sound of constant low-flying aircraft. The cost of this situation in terms of lost sleep, impaired health, and shaken nerves is, of course, incalculable.

Yet, the justified complaints of our people go unheard and increasingly, in fact, unacknowledged. If the public agencies involved, or the airlines themselves, displayed any determined effort to correct this menace or to develop noise controls of one kind or another, then there might be cause for hope. But as far as we can determine there is little or no serious effort being made to live up to the obligations toward the general public inherent in the public franchise enjoyed by airlines and in the responsibilities of public regulatory agencies.

As a last resort, we are seeking the assistance of the Congress: first, to define the areas of authority and responsibility, and then to see to it that the rights of the people to protection of their health and safety are respected.

Thank you very much for your cooperation.

Is Space the Way to Peace and Abundance?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 7, 1959

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANFUSO] is not only one of the ablest but one of the most devoted and serious-minded Members of the Congress, enjoying the respect of his colleagues and the confidence of Speaker RAYBURN and myself. He is one of the most active members of the newly established, important Committee on Science and Astronautics and is chairman of one of its subcommittees.

Congressman ANFUSO attended the 10th Annual Congress of the International Astronautical Federation that was held in London, England, on September 4, 1959, and delivered a splendid and informative address to the members attending this particular congress. The address being entitled "Is Space the Way to Peace and Abundance?"

In my remarks I am pleased to include the excellent address made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANFUSO]:

IS SPACE THE WAY TO PEACE AND ABUNDANCE?

(Address by the Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO at the 10th Annual Congress of the International Astronautical Federation, London, England, September 4, 1959)

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of this congress, and guests, at the outset, I wish to congratulate the members of the International Astronautical Federation and particularly its illustrious president, Mr. Andrew G. Haley, for bringing us together. Mr. Haley, as an organizer and as a pioneer in the field of international cooperation and space law, has no peer.

As a member of the Science and Astronautics Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives, I feel that on this occasion we can share a few thoughts of common interest.

Let us first face the fact that never in its history has the world been so near to destroying itself; that never before has so much deception in diplomacy been practiced and that never has there been so much talk of peace, while all the planning is for war. The situation is like inviting someone to your home for dinner, while making arrangements for his demise.

It is in this kind of world that we must seek the ingredients for peace.

We know that man has already discovered a new world—many times larger than the world Columbus found—but it is one of unexplored horizons. We have opened the door to the heavens' pathless way. The questions now being asked are these: Will what we find there be good or evil? Will it prove to be a boon to humanity, or are we getting nearer to the day of destruction?

As we look back over the recent past, it is hard to believe that man's efforts to penetrate outer space came to fruition less than 2 years ago. Prior to that time, most people regarded satellite orbits and interplanetary travel as nothing more than the fantasies of children or visionaries, of comic-strip cartoonists or science-fiction writers. During these past 2 years everyone has come to recognize that the practicality of space flight has been demonstrated. The impact of all this on people's minds has been unprecedented. Of all the wonders wrought by the progress of science and technology, it seems to me that none before—not even nuclear energy—has opened such vistas for mankind. Certainly none has ever promised to free us, while still alive, from the earth itself.

At this great international gathering, it is fitting to review the material benefits, in new knowledge and the practical applications thereof, which we may reasonably expect from man's future explorations in outer space. No less important is it for us to consider the prospects that may be offered for permanent world peace. But we must not let ourselves be so dazzled by these glittering possibilities that we forget the deeper meaning of our emergence into outer space. I refer, of course, to man's moral sense, his curiosity and capacity for wonder, his faith and reverence in God, and his spirit of adventure.

I shall not waste the time of this learned audience with details of the possibilities which the exploration of space has to offer. As a layman, I am interested in the practical aspects of these discoveries and particularly how this will affect our daily lives. I am interested, for example, in the observation made by Dr. James Van Allen who said that the progress of space science and technology will bring (and I quote):

"A rich and continuing harvest of important practical applications. Many of these applications will be of military value; but their greater value will be to the civilian community at large."

Dr. Fred Whipple, Director of the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory, said:

"Weather forecasting, in my opinion, will become a science instead of an art. I predict that its value to the country will greatly outweigh the cost of the entire (space) program."

Dr. Wernher von Braun said that communication satellites will not only pay for themselves, "but pay for trips to the moon and other ventures in this business."

The few examples I have cited could be multiplied many times. They are the serious predictions of responsible and eminent men.

I am convinced that the expansion of knowledge and its applications can be speeded up by providing greater incentive for scientific and engineering efforts. Accordingly, I introduced a bill in Congress in April of this year, known as H.R. 6288. It calls for the creation of a Presidential Medal of Science, which is to be awarded to persons who make outstanding contributions in the physical, biological, mathematical or engineering sciences. Needless to say, achievements in the space sciences and technology are included. My bill was passed unanimously by the House of Representatives on August 19, 1959, and 2 days later by the Senate of the United States. I trust that this law will serve as an incentive for further scientific progress.

I am further convinced that the progress of space science and technology and the peaceful uses of outer space will be greatly facilitated by a full partnership of cooperating nations. Many projects in outer space, which could benefit all mankind, would be literally impossible without international cooperation, for example, if they required the use of worldwide tracking or telemetering equipment or of launching sites in certain geographical locations. Costs alone will prevent some nations, or even any one nation, from undertaking certain ambitious space operations. Some of these space projects can be done better and more cheaply if they are carried out as joint enterprises of two or more nations.

There is reason to hope that a good deal of international cooperation in the peaceful uses of outer space will be forthcoming in the foreseeable future. A good beginning has already been made. The cooperation of many nations in the International Geophysical Year (IGY) and the Committee on Space Research (Cospar) established by the International Council of Scientific Unions, has been most encouraging. Even the United Nations Ad Hoc Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space has produced some valuable results, although several nations have refused to participate in its work on the ground that its membership is unrepresentative. This situation should be corrected as soon as possible.

I propose that all governments interested in the peaceful uses of outer space should create a Committee on Space Cooperation, with fair representation from the Communist and non-Communist worlds. In my opinion, the Committee should be established within the framework of the United Nations. In any event, its functions would be the exploration and development of outer space in the common interest of all mankind. If subcommittees were subsequently formed in the various member nations, I would hope that in my own country, at least, suitable representation would be provided for science, industry, and the Government, and that both the legislative and executive branches of Government would be represented in its membership.

The challenge of outer space demands a full and true partnership, first among nations, then among science, industry, and government. To deny such participation in the peaceful exploits into outer space would widen the no man's land barrier presently existing between the Western and Communist worlds and would invite further full-scale competition. The discoveries then, on both sides, could easily be diverted, not to create a peaceful and closer knit world of abundance where no one need be in want, but to create even more menacing ways of destroying the world than we have today. Thus we would all be the losers in such competition.

Prior to attending this meeting, I addressed letters to both President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Khrushchev urging that they discuss this one area of possible agreement as a step toward world unity. I have further suggested that this proposal be given consideration by the United Nations and the NATO powers prior to the meeting of the heads of state.

An example of what can be done by joint peaceful cooperation is the agreement reached in April of this year between the United States and Canada in ionospheric research.

Another example is the agreement announced only July 29 of this year between the United States and Great Britain under which agreement British scientists will prepare the instrumentation for satellites to be put into orbit by the United States.

Still another forward step in the joint use of outer space is being taken by the International Telecommunications Union, which is meeting at this moment in Geneva.

I believe that agreement on space frequencies could set a pattern for multilateral cooperation in other space activities. Through their partnership in outer space, nations can learn the ways of meaningful cooperation on earth. Certainly cooperation is a more fruitful and more effective method than coercion—or even mere coexistence—if our goals are peace and abundance.

Whether mankind's emergence into outer space will serve the cause of peace is still a matter of hope, rather than conviction. It is true that space technology can be used for either peace or war. For that very reason, however, war has become all the more obnoxious and impractical. General Lemnitzer, the U.S. Army Chief of Staff, predicted recently that missiles will soon create "strategic nuclear disarmament," becoming so numerous and relatively invulnerable that no attack can prevent retaliation.

Regardless of such military considerations, I feel strongly that an arms race to dominate outer space must be avoided. National rivalries should be confined to the earth—and, if possible, buried there for all times.

Some observers have suggested that enterprises in outer space will provide mankind with a moral equivalent of war. Early in this century, the American philosopher and psychologist, William James, made the following comment:

"What we now need to discover in the social realm is the moral equivalent of war; something heroic that will speak to men as universally as war does and yet will be as compatible with their spiritual selves as war has proved itself to be incompatible."

We may reasonably conjecture that in the vastness of outer space man may at last find a moral equivalent of war, to evoke and satisfy his longing for adventure, his fascination with the unknown, his need to be challenged and tested to the final limit of his strength.

In addition, it is fortunate that space technology may provide the means, at long last, to maintain world peace. The risk of surprise attack, for example, could be minimized by a system of international satellite surveillance.

Perhaps the immensity of the cosmos and the new knowledge of its mysteries resulting from space exploration will bring the peoples of the world closer together in new patterns of cooperation. Is it too much to hope that man's mind and spirit will expand with the scope of his activities?

Let me conclude by saying that space can be, if we will, a way to world peace as well as abundance. If earthmen can get together on this one thing—the peaceful exploration of outer space—then that very space can be the way to the creation of a world of abundance, making war outmoded and unnecessary.

SENATE

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1959

(Legislative day of Saturday, September 5, 1959)

The Senate met at 9:30 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou guide of our pilgrim way, out of all our frustrations and fond plans that have never come to fruition, out of all the bitter sense of failure to make of ourselves the sort of person we aspire in high hours to be, nevertheless, we come feeling that round our incompleteness flows Thy greatness and round our restlessness Thy rest.

Thou dost offer to us that abiding peace which is beyond the measure of man's mind. Always Thy still small voice, if we but listen, whispers even as we make our false choices, "Come unto me, all ye who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Give us to see, we beseech Thee, that our misused freedom, our cheap pleasures, our fatal self-indulgence, so often bar us from Thee who art our very life. Forgiving our foolish ways:

"Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace."

Amen.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the usual morning hour, for the introduction of bills, petitions, and memorials, and the transaction of other routine business, with the limitation on statements of not to exceed 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object after we have a quorum call—I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, do I not have the right to make another request before the Senator is recognized for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon cannot do that on a reservation to object.

Mr. MORSE. I did not hear the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On a reservation to object the Senator from Oregon may not suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MORSE. I wanted a quorum here before I completed stating my position on the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a point of order. I make a point of order that the Senator has not been recognized for anything excepting to reserve the right to object. I am seeking recognition for some other requests to which I am sure the Senator will object, and then the Senator can be recognized in his own right, but I should like him to do that at the end of the other requests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MORSE. May I complete my statement on my reservation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in the course of time I shall not object to the morning hour with the usual 3-minute limitation, but in the absence of being allowed to have a quorum to hear the discussion, I will object now. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to consider the housing bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to inform Senators that certain Senators desire their presence immediately in the Chamber, and to request their attendance.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BUSH, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. COOPER, Mr. COTTON, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DIRKSEN, Mr. DODD, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FONG, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GORE, Mr. HART, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HRUSKA, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. KEATING, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERR, Mr. LANGER, Mr. LAUSCHE, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORTON, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. WILEY, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio entered the Chamber, and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas subsequently said: Mr. President, I am informed that the notes of the Official Reporter are now available; and I should like to have the clerk read them, in accordance with the agreement previously entered into.

The Senator from Oregon was correct in his statement, and I was in error. I did not hear the statement the Senator from Oregon made, when he said he would object "now." I thought he said he would object. Therefore, I wish to state to the Senate that I was in error in my interpretation of what the Senator from Oregon said, and the Senator from Oregon is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. It is not necessary to have the statement read. Once again the Senator from Texas has demonstrated his complete fairness when he finds himself in error. I hope I will always be as big as the Senator from Texas has been.

I do not believe we need take the time of the Senate to have the notes read, insofar as they relate to the little dispute in regard to what I did or did not say.

Instead, I suggest that we permit the Senator from Virginia to proceed with the presentation he wishes to make.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, let me ask whether it is the understanding that when the Senator from Virginia concludes his presentation, there will be a morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall make such a request.

Mr. BENNETT. I thank the Senator from Texas.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from Virginia concludes his presentation, the Senate have the usual morning hour, subject to a 3-minute limitation on statements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is H.R. 9035, relating to the issuance of series E and H savings bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Are we to have a morning hour?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We were informed that would be objected to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not have the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield a half minute.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Oregon objected to a morning hour before a quorum call, but made it very clear he would not object to a morning hour after a quorum call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In view of what took place, I would like to have the Official Reporter bring in the notes showing what the Senator said. I think the notes show that.

Mr. MORSE. I ask to have the notes read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Official Reporter will bring in the notes of what transpired before.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are waiting for the record.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, it seems there is some delay. I wonder if there would be objection to allowing the Senator from Virginia to proceed with the debate, with the understanding that when he completes his statement—and he always makes a short statement—we may go back to the matter of examining the notes.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that what the distinguished Senator from Florida said may be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the present law has a maximum interest rate of 3.26 percent on such bonds. The bill permits the maximum rate to be exceeded in case of a finding by the President that national interest so requires.

The problem in connection with savings bonds is that, beginning in the third quarter of 1956 and running to the current date, redemptions on series E and H savings bonds, with the exception of the first quarter of 1958, have continually exceeded cash sales of these bonds. In 1959 the sales of series E and H savings bonds have declined 10 percent in the first 8 months, with the downward trend of sales steepening in recent months. Moreover, the 1959 redemptions through August were 13 percent above a year ago, with the trend in this case also worsening. The excess of redemptions over sales of E- and H-bonds in July amounted to $156 million, the largest amount in any month since April 1946. Moreover, the excess of redemptions over cash sales of E- and H-bonds in the first 8 months of 1959 has amounted to $758 million, the largest cash loss for any January through August in the history of the savings bond program. Unfortunately, given the present interest rates, this excess of redemptions over cash sales is expected to continue in the future.

This problem of excess redemptions over sales in the case of savings bonds in large measure can be attributed to the increasing spread on yield which may be obtained on savings bonds and alternative forms of investment. The rate of return on E- and H-bonds is now much less favorable, relative to that on savings accounts and other forms of investment, than in earlier years. This can be shown by comparing the rates of yield for series E bonds and for different forms of investments competitive with E-bonds at the end of World War II and currently.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a tabulation showing a comparison of rates.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	End of World War II	Current yield
Series E bonds	2.9 percent	3¼ percent.
Long-term maturities of marketable Government securities.	2¼ percent	More than 4 percent.
Savings and loan shares	2⅝ percent	3⅝ percent.
Mutual savings bank deposits.	1⅝ percent	3¼ percent.
Commercial bank savings deposits.	Less than 1 percent.	2¼ percent.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, while the interest rate on series E bonds has risen only about a third of 1 percentage point from the end of World War II to the present time, the interest rates on the competitive forms of investment have risen at least a full percentage point, and in some cases by about 2 percentage points. Although the interest rate on series E bonds during and after the end of World War II was significantly higher than that for long-term maturities on marketable Government securities, the current yield on the series E bonds is about a percentage point below the current yield on these marketable Government securities.

A. SUSPENSION OF THE INTEREST RATE CEILING ON SAVINGS BONDS

The importance of maintaining a large segment of the public debt in the form of savings bonds is generally recognized. The holding by the public of such bonds is an important means of checking inflationary pressures because it absorbs funds which otherwise might be in the market competing for consumer goods. In this same connection the savings bond program also promotes saving throughout the country, as is evidenced by the fact that some 8 million individuals regularly make purchases of these bonds under payroll savings plans. In addition, the encouragement of the savings bond program is desirable because the holders of this debt represent relatively long-term investors and on the average maintain their investments in these bonds for a period of approximately 7 years.

The bulk of the savings bonds outstanding today represent series E and H bonds. These represent more than $42.6 billion of the $50.3 billion of outstanding savings bonds on August 31, 1959. The series E and H bonds now can be held by all investors, other than commercial banks. These bonds are complementary in that E-bonds are at a discount—75 percent of original maturity value—while the H-bonds are issued at par but bear interest payable semiannually. In both cases the interest yield currently is 3¼ percent to the maturity of the bond. Of the $42.6 billion in E- and H-bonds outstanding on August 31, $37.9 billion represent the discount-type series E bonds and $4.7 billion the series H bonds which pay interest semiannually. In addition, approximately $7.6 billion in old series F, G, J, and K bonds are still outstanding although the sales of these bonds were discontinued after April 30, 1957.

The administration has presented to your committee plans to solve the savings bond problem by bringing the savings bond interest rate back approximately to the same relative competitive position with other forms of comparable investments which it held in 1952. It hopes to do this by providing a higher rate of interest on savings bonds. The administration has indicated that it would like to provide a higher interest rate not only for new bonds beginning with those issued as of June 1, 1959, but also with respect to the E- and H-bonds which are already outstanding. Thus, its present plans call for a rise in the interest rate on new issues of savings bonds from approximately 3¼ percent yield to maturity to a yield to maturity of approximately 3¾ percent. Similarly, an increase of approximately one-half of 1 percentage point would also be provided in the case of the future yield of outstanding E- and H-bonds, if held to maturity.

Your committee's bill grants the administration's request in that it permits the present 3.26 percent interest rate ceiling for savings bonds to be exceeded. However, it has provided that this 3.26 percent ceiling may be exceeded only when the President finds with respect to any offering that such action would be in the national interest.

As requested by the administration, your committee's bill also makes it possible to exceed the interest rate ceiling and raise the interest rate applicable to outstanding savings bonds on which the rates of interest have already been fixed. This too, however, requires a finding by the President, in the same manner as outlined above that the public interest requires this ceiling rate to be exceeded.

B. TIME LIMIT ON LIABILITY OF AGENTS FOR ERRONEOUS PAYMENTS OF SAVINGS BONDS

Under present law qualified paying agents authorized to cash in savings bonds for holders can be relieved from liability to the United States for losses only upon a determination by the Secretary of the Treasury that there was no fault or negligence on the part of the agent, regardless of the length of time elapsing before the loss is discovered. However, where there is a long period of time before the United States discovers a loss, it is difficult for the paying agents to prove that the loss resulted from no fault or negligence on their part.

In view of this the bill provides that the liability of the paying agent is to terminate at the end of 10 years after the erroneous payment, unless a written notice of the liability, or potential liability, has been given during the interval.

C. PERMITTING TRUST FUNDS TO OBTAIN BONDS AT THE ISSUE PRICE

Under present law Government obligations may be acquired on original issue by six Government trust funds only by purchasing the obligations at par. The trust funds involved are the unemployment trust fund, the Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund, the Federal disability insurance trust fund, the railroad retirement account, the special trust account for the payment of certain bonds of the Philippines, and the highway trust fund.

To the extent that the Treasury in the future offers securities on occasion at slight discounts—or premiums—existing law prevents these trust funds from buying the securities from the Treasury on original issue at prices other than par. The bill amends existing law to provide that these trust funds may acquire obligations of the United States on original issue at the issue price, whether or not this is at par.

D. CLARIFYING EXEMPTION OF U.S. OBLIGATIONS FROM STATE OR LOCAL TAXATION

Present law provides that obligations of the United States are to be exempt from taxation by or under State or local authority. The Supreme Court has held that this includes the exemption of interest on U.S. obligations from taxation by or under State or local authority. It has been pointed out to the committee, however, that one State has taken the position that the statute as now worded does not prohibit a State from including interest on Federal obligations in computing "gross income" upon which taxable net income is determined.

The bill makes it clear that the exemption for Federal obligations extends to every form of taxation that would require either the obligation, or the interest on it, or both to be considered directly or indirectly in the computation of the tax, except nondiscriminatory franchise taxes on corporations and except estate or inheritance taxes.

E. NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN OR LOSS IN THE CASE OF EXCHANGES OF CERTAIN U.S. SAVINGS BONDS

The House bill contained a provision providing for the nonrecognition of gain or loss on the surrender to the United States of outstanding U.S. obligations solely in exchange for new U.S. obligations. This tax-free exchange was to be available only when so provided by regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The committee has retained this provision of the House bill, but modified it so that it applies only to the exchange of series E savings bonds for series H savings bonds. Your committee believed it was desirable to limit the application of this nonrecognition provision to series E and H savings bonds, in view of the fact that the treatment of these bonds represents the primary subject of this bill, postponing for future consideration the application of this nonrecognition provision in the case of other bonds.

I hope this bill will be enacted.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I tried to follow very carefully the reading of the purpose of the bill. If I understood the distinguished chairman of the committee correctly, he mentioned that the interest rate would be 3¾ percent on series E and H savings bonds. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is what the Treasury has announced it will be.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is it a fact that nowhere in the bill or in the report is there any limitation whatsoever set forth? Under the bill, as I read it, contrary to what has been contained in the news stories to the effect that this is an effort to raise the interest rates on E- and H-bonds from 3¼ to 3¾ percent, the President can, after the bill is enacted, raise the interest rate to 10 percent, 20 percent, or 30 percent. This bill gives the President unlimited power, as I read it and the report, to pay whatever interest he wishes, so long as it is on savings bonds.

Then, of course, a precedent will have been set, and it will be said that, having done this for savings bonds, we must make the interest uniform, and we can have the sky be the limit on interest, and pay whatever the President desires to pay on long-term regular, marketable bonds.

I think the bill has been sold to the country through perhaps erroneous advertising in the press that this bill raises the interest rate on series E and H bonds from 3¼ percent to 3¾ percent, when, in fact, there may be an unlimited raising of interest rates.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. There is no limit in the bill, but the President must make a case and a finding that an increase is in the national interest. While there is no ceiling on the interest rate fixed in the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to prevent the deluge of sales of these bonds, has said that if the law is enacted he will issue bonds on the basis of 3¾ percent. He made the statement in view of the tremendous sales of savings bonds, which are now bringing only 3¼ percent interest, when one can buy other Government bonds on the market bearing interest rates of as much as 3¾ percent, approximately.

Mr. MONRONEY. But if the Secretary of the Treasury wishes to issue these bonds at 3¾ percent, why do we not say so, instead of giving the President unlimited authority—something no President in our history has ever possessed. I had the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress do some research into this question. No President, George Washington included, has ever been given power to issue these savings bonds without an interest ceiling.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I may advise the Senator that in committee an amendment was offered to fix the maximum interest rate at 4¼ percent, but out of the 15 committee members present, the vote was 5 in favor and 10 against.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I offered an amendment in committee to put a 3¾-percent limitation on these bonds, exactly the same limitation we have on other long-term bonds. As the Senator from Virginia knows, I am going to offer that amendment in the Senate. So the Senator from Oklahoma will have an opportunity to vote on whether a limitation should be put on such bonds.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Were hearings held on the bill?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. There was no opportunity to hold public hearings, but the committee heard representatives of the Treasury Department. This bill was received from the House only very recently.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Did the Treasury give specific justification for removing the limit entirely?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Treasury testified that it must be in a position to compete in the market.

If the Senator will look at the bond quotations, he will find there are a number of Government bonds selling at substantially below par which can be bought on the market today. Some of them will yield 4½ to 4¾ percent, and one can simply present the savings bonds to the bank, get his money, and buy these other bonds on the market.

The Secretary of the Treasury thought it would be very desirable to give this power to the President. But the President must make a public finding that an increase in interest is necessary if it exceeds the present maximum interest rate of 3.26 percent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If I may ask the Senator one or two more questions, I sympathize with the objective of raising the interest rate on savings bonds to 3¾ percent. It is a fact of life which we must face. Perhaps it is desirable.

On page 2 of the report the history of interest on these bonds is indicated and it is pointed out that in 1957, when the administration asked that the interest rate be increased to 3¼ percent, instead of 3 percent, Congress then responded by providing a 3.26 percent limit. I am wondering why, in view of that precedent, the committee in this case recommends the removal of the ceiling entirely.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. There was no ceiling in the bill when it came from the House. In view of the crisis, and it is a very serious crisis, that confronts us with respect to the selling of savings bonds, the committee thought we should trust the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to the extent provided in the bill, requiring that a public finding or proclamation will have to be made if the necessity to increase the 3.26 percent interest rate develops.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that the President of the United States would always make a finding or come to a conclusion as specified on page 5 of the report? I understand the five principles set forth there must be met. Is it not true that the President would always, in good conscience, and perfectly sincerely, feel that way, anyway, if he wished to increase the rate to 4¼ or to 4 percent? Is not this merely language rather than a real restriction?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I do not agree with the Senator, because the factors are set forth.

The President has to consider these factors as to increasing the rate:

(1) The effect on the growth of the economy;

(2) The effect on the economic stability of the country;

(3) The interest rates paid on other major forms of savings and investments;

(4) The distribution of the public debt between savings bonds and other obligations; and

(5) The longrun effect of any offering made above the statutory ceiling on monetary policies and on economical debt management.

The Senator is aware of the fact that in the first 8 months of 1959 the sales of E- and H-bonds exceeded purchases in the amount of $758 million. I think the Senator recognizes that as a very serious fact.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I recognize that. That is why it is necessary for Congress to provide something.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. These savings bonds of all kinds total approximately $50 billion—$42 billion in the E- and H-bonds and $8 billion in other savings bonds. If the holders of all these bonds should present them for payment, or sell them, this country would face a financial crisis of the first magnitude.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator would agree wholeheartedly that the administration should be permitted to go up to 3¾ percent. My question is whether any information was elicited in the committee, from the Department or from any other source, to justify the removal of the ceiling entirely?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The committee thought we should do so, after careful consideration. The Ways and Means Committee of the House thought so. The House of Representatives thought we should do so. We gave the matter our best judgment. We thought it was a matter of extreme importance. I think a very critical situation faces us.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the Senator think that reason No. 3—"the interest rates paid on other major forms of savings and investments"—represents a very real reason why the Treasury should be free to make its savings bonds competitive?

The Senator from Utah remembers that during the committee discussion it was pointed out that 4 percent is a very common rate for savings in the building and loan associations, and in some cases the rates are up as high as 4½ percent. In addition to the reasons which exist in terms of competition with other Government bonds, the use of building and loan associations as a form of savings has become increasingly important to the American people who have small amounts of money to save.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. If the building and loan association rates are substantially above the rates on Government bonds, it seems to me the Treasury might be at a very real disadvantage, and there is no ceiling on the rate a building and loan association can pay.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Utah. One can dispose of savings bonds and use the money to buy other Government bonds, some of which are selling as low as 81 cents on the dollar. A person can get as much as 4½ percent interest yield on his money.

Mr. BENNETT. That is correct. One can get as much as 4½ percent if one puts his money into some building and loan associations.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. One can do it with other Government securities now.

Mr. PROXMIRE and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it the position of the committee it might be the case that the administration would like to go higher than 4¼ percent interest on savings bonds, in order to be in a position to be more competitive vis-a-vis other forms of investment?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Treasury has already announced the rate. The Treasury has done a very unusual thing. Prior to the passage of the bill the Treasury has announced that if the bill is passed it will issue bonds at 3¾ percent interest. That was done to stop the increasing sales of these bonds. I think the position of the Treasury is that it does not know what the future holds with respect to these matters. We have to put these savings bonds in a competitive position.

If we have any class of citizens in the United States entitled to a proper and just interest from the Government, it is the holders of these savings bonds. These are the small investors. Eight billion dollars worth of bond purchases have resulted from collections in payroll deductions from persons who wanted to purchase these bonds.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the event the Congress should decide to limit the rate the Federal Government could pay on savings bonds to 3¾ percent or to 4¼ percent, that would not have any immediate effect on the Treasury, inasmuch as the Treasury has committed itself to selling bonds at 3¾ percent?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Treasury has committed itself for the immediate present. Nobody knows what the future will hold with respect to the requirements.

I think we are confronted by a very serious condition. If one looks at the Wall Street Journal, one finds that not a single Government bond is selling at par today—not a single one—and that many of these bonds are selling at 85, and one is selling as low as 81 cents on the dollar.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it then the position of the Senator from Virginia that the administration should not have to come back to the Congress for further approval, if the administration should want to go above 3¾ percent interest or even above 4¼ percent interest, and should be able to meet the competition, based upon the judgment of the President and of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Based on the judgment of the President, in carrying out the policy, and considering the factors I have mentioned.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator has covered very well the prejudice to savers and the fact that in the present market for interest rates if one had a ceiling it would very likely become a floor. In other words, if we provide a 4¼ percent interest ceiling it is very likely the rate will go to that and will be pressing against it immediately, whereas if we provide for flexibility the Government will be in a competitive position.

I have one other question which I should like to ask the Senator, as to the effect of passing the bill upon the long-term Treasury bonds, not on the savings bonds. I shall produce later in the day a series of answers from all Government bond dealers, to indicate that they feel the only way, at the present time, in which the market can be stabilized, or has a chance of being stabilized, in regard to long-term Treasury bonds, short of an interest rate increase on long-term Treasury bonds, is by an increased interest rate on the savings bonds. It is said that attrition is endangering the whole savings bond market; that is, the cash attrition of $156 million, which is a new high, which we lost, net, on the E- and H-bonds in July 1959, alone.

What I should like to ask the Senator is whether the committee gave consideration to those factors in respect to this bill, and thought that they would have an effect not only with regard to the selling of the savings bonds but also with regard to helping correct the very dangerous condition in which the whole long-term Treasury bond market now finds itself?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senate Committee on Finance did give consideration to that problem. As the Senator knows, there is no interest ceiling on bonds issued for less than a 5-year term. When the bonds go above 5 years the ceiling on interest is 4¼ percent. The Senator from Virginia would be glad to vote to remove that ceiling at this time. However, we were told if we did so the House would not agree and we would lose the savings bond rate increase. So the committee did not take up the question of increasing the 4¼ percent interest ceiling or taking off the ceiling on other bonds.

I will say to the Senator, I think of money as a commodity. I think that when money is scarce interest rates go up. When money is plentiful interest rates go down. I say that as a businessman who has had considerable experience in this field, and as a member of the Committee on Finance for 26 years. I say to the Senator from New York that at no other time in my 26 years have we faced a situation such as we face today, with the debt approaching $300 billion.

It was necessary for the Treasury to sell $13 billion worth of new bonds in this past year, and we had a deficit of $13 billion. In addition to that, a great percentage of our bonds are on a short-term basis. $85 billion worth of bonds must be refinanced in the coming year. I think we are in a very serious condition.

I say as one Senator—I know others do not agree with me—I would vote to take off the ceiling completely, and I would trust the Treasury Department and would trust the President of the United States to maintain the integrity of the bonds. When an investor looks at the bond quotations we see in the Wall Street Journal, he sees that not a single Federal bond is selling at par, yet when he looks at the stock quotations on the opposite page, he notes generally they are constantly going up, despite the fact that stocks are not paying in dividends any more than the bonds are paying in interest.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one other question. Would the Senator feel that, in fairness in the situation, the Treasury Department ought to make a special drive, if given the increased interest rate opportunity, to sell more savings bonds?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I agree.

Mr. JAVITS. It should not simply go along with the normal savings bond program.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I will say to the Senator, that is one of the purposes of this legislation.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from New York to this colloquy.

I notice one thing the committee has done which I think is a mistake. The committee has stricken out the House language which would make it possible to exchange the E- and H-bonds for other issues on the same basis that other bondholders are allowed to exchange bonds. When we talk about some incentive to buy savings bonds, I think the committee has taken away the best incentive which was in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the chairman would care to comment, I should like to have his comments in that regard. I certainly see no reason why the little people, who buy these savings bonds, should not have the opportunity, when a more desirable issue comes along, to exchange the bonds, as everybody else does.

At one time I asked Secretary Humphrey that question, and his answer was, "They can cash their savings bonds and buy the other bonds."

What happens, when the people cash their bonds, is that they must pay the income tax on the interest. I will not complain about that. I rather question the proposition of allowing a rollback of that tax liability. However, I do not make any great point of that. Not only does the holder of the bond have to pay income tax, but he must also go to a broker and pay a commission for buying the new bond. The holder of a $10,000 block of other bonds does not have to do that. He simply sends the bonds to the Treasury, and the Treasury makes the exchange. Why penalize the little man who holds these bonds, when he exchanges them? We talk about incentive, Mr. President. That is the way to build up incentive.

Mr. FREAR. Right along that line, would the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I think I should like to reply because I believe the Senator from Alabama is in error on the point he has just made. The committee bill does provide that the holder of E-bonds can convert over into H-bonds and get tax deferment on their interest of the E-bond.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Into H-bonds, but I am talking about other bonds.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I would have no objection to rolling over into other bonds, and I do not think the committee would. However, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that what he is proposing in the House language is the right of banks to roll over, and that is what the Senate committee eliminated in our committee amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I understand, the House provision—I may be in error, and if so I certainly welcome being set straight—as I understand, the House provision would have allowed the holders of E-bonds and H-bonds to exchange them for other types of bonds, but the Senate struck that out, and allows E-bond holders to exchange them for H-bonds, and that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. If the Senator will read the committee report, he will find that the Senate committee allowed the E- and H-bond holders all the authority which was extended under the House bill, but the Senate committee struck from the bill the language which would have permitted banks and insurance companies who hold these other marketable bonds which are selling at around 80 or 85, to exchange them and get the tax deferment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That may be right, but that is not the way I read the language of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I believe that the Senator will find that what is done is to confine this tax deferment privilege to E- and H-bond holders. We struck from the committee bill all the language which would have extended any tax deferment to the holders of marketable Government bonds in general. I believe the chairman of the committee will support me in that position.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not interested in the rollback. I do not know that the committee made a mistake in allowing that, if I understand what is meant by rollback, that is, the withholding of income tax liability until a later date.

Mr. FREAR. A deferment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. A deferment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. We struck that out. The committee did not allow that except for holders of E- and H-savings bonds.

Mr. SPARKMAN. At the present time the holders of all bonds, except E- and H-bonds, can exchange them at any time for other issues simply by taking them to the Treasury and having the Treasury do it for them. They do not have to go to a broker to have it done; they have the Treasury do it. I do not understand why we do not extend that same privilege to the holders of E- and H-bonds. I do not understand why they too should not have the right to make the exchange on the same basis.

I remember, for instance, when the 3¼-percent issue came out in the spring of 1953, all that the holders of the old issues—2½ percent, 1¾ percent, and those low interest rate issues—had to do was to send their bonds to the Treasury. They simply swapped them for the new issue. Why should not the holder of the E-bond be permitted to do that? Instead, at the present time he must sell the bond, pay income tax on it, then go to a broker and pay a commission for buying the new desirable issue. I say these people ought to have the same privilege as other bondholders. That should be done particularly if we wish to give them an incentive to buy bonds. After all, I think the public generally has done a magnificent job in buying E- and H-bonds—to the extent of $42 billion, or something like that.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That amendment was adopted by a vote of eight to six.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly hope the Senate will see fit to vote down that committee amendment, or at least write in a provision which will make it possible to exchange E- and H-bonds for other bond issues, just as the banks can do now, or as individuals can do, who buy big blocks of other bond issues. Let the little fellow have a chance.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. If the Senator from Alabama will check the record and talk with the Treasury Department, he will find that voting down the amendment of the Committee on Finance will not extend to the E- and H-bondholders the right to convert their bonds with the tax deferment into other types of marketable securities which are selling on the open market. If we vote down the amendment we will be extending to the banks which now hold E- and H-bonds and all the other types of bonds the right to convert those bonds. I do not know whether that should or should not be done, but I do not believe that there will be accomplished what is sought to be accomplished by the proposed action.

Mr. MONRONEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FREAR. As has been stated here, this is a very important issue. I believe, however, the exchange of E- and H-bonds for new H-bonds is not the only important fact in the pending bill. I believe that the Senator from Alabama also stated that approximately $42 billion was outstanding at the present time in E- and H-bonds. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. In E- and H-bonds.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is E- and H-bonds.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not true that $38 billion of the $42 billion is in E-bonds?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The maturity value of the $38 billion is $40 billion. Is that right?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes. That does not include the other class of savings bonds.

Mr. FREAR. I believe that the H-bonds bear interest payable either quarterly or semiannually. There is no accrued unpaid interest on H-bonds. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. The interest on E-bonds accumulates. In other words, a $100 bond sells for $75, and at maturity it is worth $100. The difference between the purchase price and the maturity value of E-bonds is not taxable as income until the bond is cashed.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is optional with the holder of the bond. He can take it either way.

Mr. FREAR. He can report it if he wishes to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. But he does not have to report it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. In the majority of cases, the interest on E-bonds is not reported. I believe the Treasury will substantiate that. I believe that was the testimony of the representatives of the Treasury Department who appeared before the committee; they gave that impression.

If we assume that approximately $40 billion of E-bonds are outstanding, and they are put into H-bonds on an exchange basis, we are relieving approximately, assuming that a person is in the 50-percent bracket, $10 billion. A 50-percent bracket means that $5 billion is what the Treasury would collect on that income by taxes if the taxes were not deferred. My point is that we are deferring tax liability to the extent of $5 billion, or approximately that, in the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is done already. The E-bond holders already have the privilege of making a choice whether to pay their taxes currently or when they cash the bonds. That is one of the inducements to people to buy the E-bonds. On the H-bonds, the interest is paid semiannually, and must be included in income tax returns as income.

Mr. FREAR. That is true, but there is a difference in the interest rate between the E-bonds and the H-bonds. If the holder of an E-bond wishes to exchange it for the higher rate H-bond proposed in the bill, he must make an exchange, in order to do so, and he does not have to pay taxes on the income or the interest rate on the original E-bond.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If my understanding is correct, the Senator is in error in referring to H-bonds as bearing a higher interest rate. It is my understanding that the interest rate is identical on the two types of bonds.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. They both carry the same interest rate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. They both carry the same interest rate. However, there is this advantage. After an E-bond comes to maturity, it is advantageous to the holder to exchange it for an H-bond.

Mr. FREAR. I do not think the Senator from Alabama quite understood. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. The bill authorizes H-bonds at a higher interest rate than the present E-bonds.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But it also proposes to raise the rate on E-bonds. Both types of bonds carry the same rate of interest.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. It is proposed to make this provision retroactive to June 1.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; but they both carry the same rate of interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Under existing law, without any further legislation, the holder of an E-bond, whose bond is worth $100 when it comes due, may, with or without the proposed legislation, elect, under Treasury regulations, to extend it for another period of 10 years, and get the increased tax deferment. He can do that under existing law. The bill before us today provides that he may convert a $100 E-bond into an H-bond, which pays the same rate of interest, and get the tax deferment until he cashes his H-bond, and collect interest on the full $100, payable semiannually.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator makes reference to the first period, during which the $75 bond increases in value to $100. When the extension period is over, he is through.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct unless he elects to transfer to H-bonds or extend the E-bond for another term.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The bond does not continue to draw interest beyond that time. Therefore, he is getting an advantage at that point by being able to exchange it for an H-bond. If I were able to do it, and went into the market and bought $10,000 worth of 3¼s or 4¼s, or whatever they may be, or if I were holding $10,000 of 2½s, the old issue, which is probably selling today in the 90s or 80s, I could exchange those bonds for a brandnew issue by sending my bonds to the Treasury. The Treasury would make the exchange for me, and I would get the advantage of going from the lower interest rate to the higher rate.

If I have $10,000 worth of E-bonds, why should I not have exactly the same privilege? Let us give to the little man who buys his bonds, perhaps, on the monthly payroll plan over a period of years, and who, in the course of time, accumulates a considerable holding, exactly the same privilege which we give to the buyers of big blocks of other issues.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I agree that we should give this type of investor all the breaks. I agree with the Senator's statement, but I do not agree with the method by which the Senator says we can accomplish the desired result. In my opinion this bill would accomplish what the Senator says he wishes to do.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Only as between E- and H-bonds. It does not cover the field of general issues.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Those are the only types of bonds with respect to which the Government guarantees the holder the full return of his money, plus interest.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I realize that; but when the holder of the E- or H-bond converts it into another type of bond, he is taking a risk. He is giving up the Government guarantee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct; but I feel that in addition the E- and H-bonds should be issued at a rate of interest comparable to the rate paid in the general interest market. I have recommended publicly, and will do so again today, that the E-bond holder should be given not 3¾ percent, but 4 percent. If the Government is to sell these bonds, they will have to be issued on a 4 percent basis. I believe also that it would be a better bond if it were put on a 10-year basis, instead of carrying uncertain maturity dates, which are confusing. There are some outstanding E-bonds which run for 8 years and 11 months, some for 9 years and 8 months, and some which run the full 10 years. The result is a complete state of confusion among holders as to exactly when their bonds mature.

I suggested that they be put on a flat 10-year basis, so that people could remember the maturity dates. Then they should not be compelled to hold them to full maturity under penalty of losing their interest. If, because of unexpected sickness or emergency, they have to cash their bonds, they should be entitled to the bulk of the interest. I have proposed a more liberal formula which I have hopes the Treasury would adopt. I shall recommend it here today. I am not incorporating it in legislation, because it has always been the policy to allow the Treasury to have discretionary authority.

I am not concerned about raising this interest on E-bonds to 3¾ percent. I am concerned because I think it should be raised to 4 percent and will require a 4-percent bond to get the bond sales off dead center.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. Did I correctly understand the senior Senator from Delaware to say that there were Government bonds that were not guaranteed to be payable at par on the maturity date?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. No. Certainly they will be paid at maturity

Mr. FREAR. Then I misunderstood.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. As I understood the Senator from Alabama, when he speaks of the right of the E-bond holder to convert such bonds into regular marketable securities, he states that there is no guarantee that they will be selling at par when the holder demands his money prior to the maturity date.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. A savings bond can be cashed at face value after 60 days. With respect to other bonds, selling at 81, or something like that, the holder receives 100 cents on the dollar only if they are held to maturity.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. Do I correctly understand, from the previous statement of the chairman of the committee, that the only advantage in exchanging E-bonds for H-bonds under the provisions of the bill before us is that the holders of E-bonds could delay or defer the tax on the accumulated interest on the E-bonds, and at the same time get a bond on which he could receive interest payable semi-annually. That is the only advantage. I do not wish the chairman or anyone else to misunderstand my position. I am in favor of giving the Treasury Department the privilege of exchanging such bonds and deferring the tax on the interest until the H-bond has been sold or disposed of.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I have before me a copy of the latest quotations on Government securities. There is not a single Government bond selling at par. Some are selling as low as 81, and some are bringing an interest return of 4.78, or nearly 5 percent. There are only two issues of Treasury notes, coming due in the immediate future, which are selling at par. Treasury bills are selling at 4.59. They are 90-day paper.

I think we have a serious situation, which we must handle. If we do not do something about the savings bonds, and they are cashed in, we shall have a financial crisis of the first magnitude.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. As usual, I receive instruction when the able Senator from Virginia discusses the debt. I would vote to increase the interest rate on savings bonds. As regards long-term issues, back on March 23, 1959, the Treasury offered 12-year bonds at 4 percent, and received subscriptions of about $1½ billion, and sold only a little more than $600 million.

On February 28, 1958, the Treasury offered 3 percent 8½-year bonds, and received $6 billion of subscriptions, but sold only $1½ billion. In the opinion of the able chairman, is this because of inept management of the debt, or because of changing conditions?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator is recognized as one of the best businessmen in the Senate. I think he will recognize that there has been a considerable change in conditions with respect to interest rates. The interest rate is governed by the demand for money. All interest rates have gone up. Banks have raised interest on savings in the last 60 to 90 days. Interest rates have gone up all along the line.

The Senator will recall that in 1954, Secretary Humphrey issued a 30-year bond for 3¼ percent. He was severely citicized, because it was alleged that his action resulted in an increase in the interest rates for private loans, and other borrowings. But those bonds finally went up to 112 and now they are selling around 87. In other words, a difference of 25 points in those bonds has developed within the last 5 years.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Will the Senator tell us what he believes is the major reason for the change?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. If people can get greater interest on other securities than they get on Government bonds, they will make such investments and get better interest.

Mr. FREAR. Is that not also true with respect to Government-insured obligations which bear a higher rate of interest? Is not the money just as secure, as far as safety is concerned, in these other obligations as it is in Government bonds?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. FREAR. In reply to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], is it not true that there are obligations which are insured by the Government which pay a higher rate of interest, and in reality are probably just as good as the Government bonds themselves?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I was only referring to the time element. Only last March we were offering long-term, 12-year bonds at 4 percent and the Treasury accepted only about one-third of the subscription. The year before that we were offering 3-percent long-term bonds for 8½ years and the Treasury accepted less than a quarter of the subscriptions. It seems to me that a tremendous change has taken place over a short period of time. For example, in August 1957, the administration was saying that the way to correct this problem is to look before buying. In January 1958, they were saying the way to correct the situation is, in effect, to buy before looking. So I was wondering if the rapid change was due to an improvement or was due to the normal fluctuation of money rates.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. If the Senator will tell me why the stock market has risen as it has, perhaps we can answer the question of interest on bonds.

Mr. FREAR. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee another question or two, if he would permit me.

In the light of our treatment of bills which come before the Finance Committee from the House under title 2, as the chairman very well knows, we struck a very important part from this bill. I believe the subject was discussed a little earlier today. That section concerned the sale of bonds other than savings bonds. I thought I understood the chairman to say that he was in favor of removing the limit on long-term bonds entirely and permitting the Secretary of the Treasury Department or the President to establish the interest rate.

I certainly think I could go along with some of that opinion myself. The part which may make some difference is that if we establish a ceiling on savings bonds higher than the established ceiling on other Government bonds, it will tend to dislodge money going into the Treasury to some extent. Is that true, or does the Senator feel that the purchasers of E- and H-bonds come from a certain segment of our economy, or the people who are in a certain economic class, and the others come from a different origin?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator is correct. Of course, they can buy E-bonds to the extent of $10,000 a year, or H-bonds to the extent of $10,000 a year.

Mr. FREAR. The purchasers of the E- and H-bonds are limited to certain categories of buyers, is that not true?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. They may invest $20,000 a year, but they can buy that amount every year.

Mr. FREAR. Are financial institutions permitted to buy E- and H-bonds?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. No; they are not.

Mr. FREAR. So financial institutions by law must buy other types of Government bonds and are not permitted to buy the savings type bonds?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] has referred to the ceiling. I wish to make clear that of our $290 billion debt, $99 billion is for a term of less than 5 years and there is no ceiling on the interest rate. We have a ceiling for the long-term bonds of more than 5 years of 4¼ percent. The interest on savings bonds to which this bill relates is 3¼ percent.

Mr. FREAR. I agree with what the chairman has said, and that is my position on the bill we have before us. However, we struck the provision permitting the President to decide the rate and taking the ceiling off long-term bonds or bonds other than savings bonds. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That provision was not in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. FREAR. Part of it was, I believe.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The House did not include that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The crucial issue on the bill before the Senate for many of us is whether or not we should remove the limit entirely. I would like to call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee to his statement on April 15, 1957, when the issue we are now considering was before Congress. At that time he said:

> The Finance Committee gave consideration to two other issues in connection with this increase. The first was the question of whether or not there should be greater flexibility for the Treasury to increase interest rates on savings bonds if inflationary pressure should build up in the future. The Treasury originally requested that the statute provide that the savings bonds rate could be raised to 4¼ percent, even though they had only announced plans to sell a 3¼-percent bond. The House bill would raise the ceiling only to 3½ percent. The Finance Committee has further reduced the new ceiling to 3.26 percent, which will be adequate to sell the bonds described in the Treasury announcement of February 14.
> Let me say that the action of the Senate Finance Committee is an indication that the committee desires to discourage further increases in interest rates in financing Federal obligations.
> We felt strongly that the serious aspects of higher interest rates require that any further increase should be accompanied by a request for legislation. Experience in the past has indicated that the market for savings bonds declines slowly enough in an inflationary period as to afford ample time for additional legislation.

Why is that not precisely true today?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The answer is the conditions are entirely different now from what they were in 1957. In 1957 savings bonds were not being cashed in. In the last 8 months savings bonds cashed in exceed sales by almost $1 billion. An entirely different situation existed in 1957. They were sold at 3.26 then and were sold readily, but they are not being sold now. To the contrary, they are being cashed in.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I recognize the rate should go to 3¾ percent. The proposal of the Senator from New Mexico under consideration provides for a tremendous flexibility all the way up to 4¼ percent, so they could compete and raise the rate from 3¾ to 4¼ percent without additional legislation.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is a question for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Three committees are waiting for the Senate to recess.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question which would take only half a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well.

Mr. MONRONEY. Could the distinguished Senator from Virginia tell me what will be the interest rate which will be available on an E-bond held for 1 year and then cashed?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The interest rate of 3¾ percent for those who hold the bonds to maturity will be dated back to June 1.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am talking about the purchase of a $100 E-bond. If I wish to cash it a year from now, what interest will my $100 bond bear?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is a complicated procedure. It will be approximately 1 to 1½ percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. I beg to disagree. I think it will keep the long elliptical curve, so that the holder will be closer to 1 percent in the market the first year.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I have the rate. I will put the table in the RECORD.

Mr. MONRONEY. No hearings were held on this item; yet we are asked to suspend an alltime, historic procedure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Under the formula in effect at present on E-bonds, the Senator from Oklahoma is substantially correct. At the end of 1 year, if the E-bond is cashed, the rate of interest would be approximately 2 percent. That is one of the points I questioned in the colloquy with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. I shall suggest later that the Treasury Department should issue these bonds on a basis wherein the bondholders will not be locked in, and that they can come nearer to getting 3¾ or 4 percent interest if, through no fault of their own, they are forced to cash their bonds before maturity.

In my opinion this should be done both from the standpoint of fairness as well as to increase sales.

I believe we are dealing with a different type of investor, a type who should be protected. I would be perfectly willing, if the Treasury felt it was too lenient, that they should restrict these sales to smaller amounts than those now in effect. But I think that at all times E-bonds should bear a reasonable interest rate in comparison with other interest rates, and that the buyers of such bonds will not be locked in and be forced to hold such bonds to maturity.

Mr. MONRONEY. Bankers tell me that the reason why the Government is being whipped to death is the competition, not so much because of interest rates, but because it is possible to get 4 percent or 3¾ percent from a building and loan association from the day the person makes his deposit. But unless a purchaser of an E-bond holds his bond up to 3 years, he will never get up to 3¾ percent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am in complete agreement with your objective and I shall make a recommendation later today with respect to it.

Mr. MONRONEY. We need to modernize the program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is in order.

PRINTING OF PRAYERS OF SENATE CHAPLAIN

Mr. MORSE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 188), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the prayers offered by the Reverend Frederick Brown Harris, Doctor of Divinity, Chaplain of the Senate, at the opening of the daily sessions of the Senate and on other occasions of special interest to the Senate, during the Eighty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Eighty-sixth Congress, be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL MEMORIAL COMMISSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution to establish a commission to formulate plans for memorials to the past Presidents of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that a statement, prepared by the Senator from Indiana, relating to the joint resolution, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 139) to establish a commission to formulate plans for memorials to the past Presidents of the United States, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas (for Mr. HARTKE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The statement of Mr. HARTKE, presented by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HARTKE

I have had introduced, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution to establish a commission, to be known as the Presidential Memorial Commission, for the purpose of considering and formulating plans for the design, construction, and location, in the Capital City or its environs, of a permanent memorial to past Presidents of the United States.

The Commission is to be composed of four Members of the U.S. Senate, four Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, and four persons to be appointed by the President of the United States. At the present time there are three monuments in this city dedicated to past Presidents—the Washington Monument, the Lincoln Memorial, and the Jefferson Memorial. Five past Presidents have statues—Presidents Buchanan, Garfield, Grant, Jackson, Lincoln, and Washington.

Just recently Congress established the James Madison Memorial Commission to consider and formulate plans for a memorial to this great President, and Congress also approved a national contest to design a memorial to our late President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. There is also a great deal of discussion for a memorial to Woodrow Wilson.

The joint resolution will provide a fitting memorial to all Presidents. As each President completes his term of office he, too, will be recognized in this memorial.

It is my hope that money for the construction of this Presidential memorial will be provided by private contribution. In order to permit this the joint resolution authorizes the Commission to accept gifts to be used in carrying out the provisions of the joint resolution or to be used in connection with the construction or other expenses of such memorial.

Any man who is outstanding enough to have served as a President of the United States deserves a memorial which will take its place in the architectural splendor of the Capital City. Certainly it will provide a real lesson in American history and will commemorate the true meaning of democracy.

MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATIONS—AMENDMENT

Mr. MORSE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 8385) making appropriations for mutual security and related agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. RANDOLPH:

Address delivered by him at the Upper Kanawha Valley Local Union's Labor Day celebration, Harris Memorial Park, Smithers, Fayette County, W. Va.; and United Mine Workers' Labor Day celebration, Comfort, Boone County, W. Va., on September 7, 1959.

By Mr. LONG of Louisiana:

Address delivered by him at graduation exercises of Loyola University May 27, 1959.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas (for Mr. HARTKE):

Excerpts from address delivered by Senator SYMINGTON before the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association, at French Lick, Ind., on August 29, 1959.

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

Address prepared by him entitled "The Weapons of Free Men."

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock a.m.) the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

At 1 o'clock and 26 minutes p.m. the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair).

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR DIRKSEN

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, as this session of Congress draws to a closing, I want to express my appreciation and admiration for a Senator who, I feel, has made outstanding contributions to this session—the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

At the beginning of this session, when the Republican Members of the Senate met to choose their officers, I did not support the candidacy of EVERETT DIRKSEN for the position of Senate minority leader. I had my reservations.

But as I have watched him perform the duties of minority leader I have increasingly come to conclude that his election to that position was a very wise action by the Senate Republicans. If another election were to be held today, I would unhesitatingly vote for EVERETT DIRKSEN for the position of minority leader.

I have long known the remarkable ability of EVERETT DIRKSEN. I have long known his dedication to his work. For years I have closely observed the meticulous manner in which he does his "homework"—in which he drives himself to be so exhaustively informed on legislation and issues coming before Congress. Anyone who has served on a committee with him—such as the Appropriations Committee—could not help but witness this meeting after meeting.

But it has been in the execution of his duties as minority leader that other qualities have come to the forefront. He has shown a capacity for understanding. By that I mean not just the kind of understanding by which one agrees with another. Instead, I mean more the kind of understanding by which one can disagree agreeably—by which one can differ with another without rancor, without impugning the motives of the other, but with respect, and with willingness to listen to the other side.

He has shown a capacity for tolerance and patience. Within the ranks of the Republican Senators there are varying shades of opinions on many legislative issues. EVERETT DIRKSEN has extended tolerance and patience to all opinions and views. But he has not extended tolerance and patience in a patronizing manner or with a condescending attitude. He has done this without compromising his own principles and beliefs.

But he has not permitted his remarkable capacity for tolerance and patience to lapse into complacency. Characteristically, he speaks softly and in reasoned terms. But when the occasion has arisen in a fitting and appropriate manner he has spoken with fire and sharpness to defend principle and integrity. On these occasions, his firm mental fiber has surfaced through the exterior of his understanding, patience, and tolerance.

To me, one of his finest performances in this session was on that occasion when reference was made to the fact that he had not been on the Senate floor during some debate. When the junior Senator from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, answered that charge he minced no words. He came straight to the point with devastating effectiveness—devastating because he spoke the truth—devastating because of the power and the vigor with which he spoke the truth.

And I think it was then that he most sharply displayed his capacity for leadership—because he did not just defend himself but instead he defended all Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle regardless of their party affiliation. For what he said then, every Member of this body owes him gratitude. For he defended all Senators from that criticism too often leveled at Senators for being absent from the Senate floor during debate. He pointed out that he was absent from the particular debate referred to only because he was in a Senate-House conference trying to work out a labor bill.

But he did not make his defense on a personal basis. Instead he exposed the unfairness of such criticism when so often Senators were absent from the Senate floor and debate only because they were working hard in committee to try to get a bill to the Senate floor for a vote.

This was an act of leadership. It was only one of the many, many instances during this session when the minority leader has more than measured up to the exacting demands of leadership.

It so pointedly demonstrates that important quality of leadership by which a leader places his colleagues collectively ahead of himself. And it is one of the many reasons why I feel that the junior Senator from Illinois has been the best Republican minority leader during all the years it has been my privilege to serve in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

Mrs. SMITH. I am very glad to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the gentle lady from Maine has long known the great admiration I have for her, and she justifies it again today by the very fine and generous statements she has made about one the most beloved Americans I know. There is no person who is more devoted to duty than EVERETT DIRKSEN. There is no person more dedicated to party than EVERETT DIRKSEN. There is no person who loves his country more than EVERETT DIRKSEN. I have never been associated or worked with a person of finer character or better disposition or greater capacity.

I thank the gentle lady from Maine for having the thoughtfulness and the generosity in her usual manner to call attention to these fine traits of character possessed by the minority leader.

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, I am sure that the distinguished minority leader will be most grateful for the Senator's statement.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mrs. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I, too, was one of the group who had another choice for minority leader when we began the session.

I am grateful to the distinguished Senator from Maine for bespeaking what I think is in the mind of every Member of that group, the fact that EVERETT DIRKSEN has served well, without seemingly even a recollection of our own position in respect to his leadership; that he has not only served his country well—and the Senator from Maine has said this magnificently—but also has served his colleagues well, in a perfectly even-handed way, without endeavoring in any way to impose his view, but, as she has said, eloquently expressing his view, as it is proper that he should for a man of such conviction.

I join in the expression of appreciation to the Senator from Maine for having said what needed to be said for all of us.

Mrs. SMITH. I thank the Senator.

DIVIDED SESSIONS OF THE SENATE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, this is about the time in the session when I believe it is appropriate to call the attention of the Members of both Houses of Congress to a matter pertaining to their conduct of legislative business, a matter pertaining to their own responsibility under the Constitution with respect to the fiscal matters of the country. It is also a matter pertaining importantly to their personal conduct, and their health, in many cases.

I will eliminate the Senator from Washington, but there are many cases where long and tedious sessions of Congress have undermined many fine men in this body. I think what the Senator from Maine has had to say is probably a good example of that, and I am sure the majority leader and others agree with me.

So I am taking time to call the attention of the Senate to S. 2846, which I introduced at the last session. At this session the bill I introduced bears another number. It has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the hope that perhaps, come January, Congress may have a look at it.

In this morning's Washington Post there appears an editorial relating directly to this subject and to other matters. I will not read the editorial, but I wish to quote one paragraph from it:

> It would be unthinkable for Congress to adjourn before completing action on badly needed legislation apart from the surplus disposal bill; civil rights, including extension of the Civil Rights Commission; the gasoline tax increase; a new public works bill; the foreign aid appropriation; stopgap housing authority; at least a minimal corrective on bond interest rates. These measures are too important for lick-and-promise consideration.

I do not know whether the Post was referring to my proposal or other proposals which I have discussed informally with the distinguished Senator from Utah and the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and other Members of this body, but at least it all relates to the same subject:

> A perfectly simple remedy has long been advocated. That is for Congress to recess in July, permit members to take a well-earned vacation with their families, and then reconvene for a cleanup session in October. It is too late, of course, for such a solution this year.

Then the editorial goes on to discuss some of the pressing matters before us now, pressing at least in the opinion of the editors.

I know there are some bugs in my proposal. This would be an important step, if Congress should decide to take it. It would be subject to many amendments and suggestions and alternatives. My proposal, in effect, as is indicated by the title of the bill, for a separate session of Congress each year to consider appropriation bills, to establish the calendar year as the fiscal year of the Government, and for other purposes. In other words, and I throw this out as a suggestion, the bill would provide that Congress divide itself into a legislative session and a fiscal session. Most legislative bodies do just that.

In other words, we would meet in January to consider important legislative matters, and then recess, to reassemble sometime in the fall—I suggest November. At that session we would consider primarily fiscal matters, with respect to which the Appropriations Committees and the Finance Committees of both bodies would hold hearings on the budget items which would be sent to the Congress in a budget message at the fall session. We would then make appropriations, and begin the fiscal year at the beginning of the calendar year.

My distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] knows that such a proposal involves many troubles and complications, but we must make a start somewhere, because I think it is obvious, from the condition in which we are at present, that it is pretty difficult to legislate as we should in the dying days of the session.

The proposed plan would also mean that we would have in one package our very important fiscal problems. We would know what Congress had authorized. We would then know whether we wish to raise taxes or appropriate money, or not. This would put the whole problem in better perspective. The people would see it in better perspective. The budget would be in better perspective. I think such a plan would do much toward achieving some of the objectives which the distinguished Senator from Virginia has discussed from time to time. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] know that some days in the Appropriations Committee, while we are considering appropriation items, the House or Senate is passing another bill on the same subject, while we are preparing to recommend an appropriation.

The Government is becoming big and complex. Federal taxes take about 20 percent of the gross national product at present. Under the proposed plan Congress could turn and study the various problems, the people would have a better understanding of what we had authorized, and what taxes and appropriations were necessary.

The proposed plan would also mean that Members of Congress could go home during the intervening time and talk with their own people. They could learn much about the feelings of the people with regard to whether or not they were willing to have further taxes taken out of their pockets.

At the present time we are under such pressure that at times it is almost impossible to know what we want to do. The suggested plan would give the Executive a better sense of perspective. Members of the executive department could study what Congress did in the legislative session, and tailor the budget accordingly.

That does not mean that Senators could not remain in Washington during the interval. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] has an interesting proposal as to the date. As I have said, there may be some "bugs" in my proposal.

In the intervening time, committees could be holding hearings on various subjects which were to be considered by the Congress in January. Committees could meet to consider nominations and treaties. I suppose there might be some emergency matters to consider.

It seems to me that we would have a better sense of direction, and the executive department would have a better sense of direction with respect to important fiscal matter. The whole Congress would have a better sense of direction with respect to the personal lives of Members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, of course—will the Senator yield to me for 3 minutes? I must attend a committee meeting at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I must attend a meeting of the Appropriations Committee shortly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

(Mr. JAVITS addressed the Senate. His remarks appear elsewhere in today's RECORD, under the appropriate heading.)

Mr. MAGNUSON. There were two or more further features contained in my original proposal, or resolution, at one time or another.

They relate to a much needed reform in our fiscal affairs. We talk about fiscal responsibility, inflation, and questions dealing with the budget, the needs of the people under the budget, the kind of budget we should have, and so forth.

We talk continually about the debt. Making the calendar year also the Government fiscal year would also, in my opinion, dictate a change in our bookkeeping system, so that the people might have a better understanding of balanced budgets, unbalanced budgets, what we owe, what we do not owe, and how much money we must borrow.

The Government keeps books like no one else. We consider what comes in, and what is appropriated for the year, and the difference is a deficit. There has been no indication to the American people at any time as to the capital assets of the Government. The Government does not keep records of capital assets, such as are kept by any well-operated company. There is much room for argument on this proposal. The argument is that the Government is not going to cease business, and therefore it does not make any difference what capital assets it has.

I do not suppose the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. will cease business. We probably would not let them do so. They have a list of capital assets. We have nothing.

It has been pointed out to the American people that some of the money we appropriate is not only reimbursable into the Treasury but in some cases it returns with interest. Many people misunderstand this operation. When we talk about borrowing and high interest rates, sometimes the American people have a conception that the Federal Government must borrow all the money it spends. The truth of the matter is we borrow only when we do not have the difference between what is in the cash register and what is paid out, which might be in some cases 1 percent of the Federal budget. This year it is more; and we should not have to do even that. Next year I hope we shall not have to borrow as much. The adoption of my proposal would serve to place our fiscal position in perspective.

I had inserted in the appropriation bill item for the General Services Administration a sufficient amount of money to make a real estate inventory, but the inventory will not be complete. It will show the value of what the Federal Government possesses and the cost at which it was acquired. In many cases the real estate is now worth millions but was acquired for nothing. However, even that information is helpful in our bookkeeping system.

We have a personal property inventory listing surplus of almost $7 billion. That is the latest figure I have received from the General Services Administration.

It seems to me that to divide the session in the way I have suggested, which most legislative parliaments in the world do, we could put all of this procedure in a better perspective. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] has talked about the merit of this plan for years. We shall know what the Congress has authorized and then we shall sit down and ask, as one Representative in the House has said on many occasions, "Where are we going to get the money?"

That procedure is more sound than Congress authorizing a project one minute and at the last minute of the session, when Congress is trying to adjourn, when we do not know what our books reveal, appropriating money for it.

One problem is posed, I suggest. Perhaps it could be solved. It is suggested we might have a "lameduck" Congressman come back for this fiscal session. There might be one or two members of the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Appropriations in that category. Those happen to be committees of the Senate which do not have too much of a turnover.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] made the suggestion to me we might wish to swear in these people on December 1 so they will come to the Senate fresh from the election to discuss these matters. That may be the answer. However, it is surely something this Congress must face up to, because we cannot continue the way we are going.

The work of Congress is at best a 9-month job out of the year. We have 3 months to ourselves at home. There is no rest for any Congressman when he goes home, and there should not be, because the people want to see him. He is just as busy at home as he is here or busier. But there should be a time when he knows he can see his constituents.

Someone suggested to me that I am not the one to pose this matter. I refer to the care of our families. I understand those who have children must take them to school, bring them back to Washington, then someone in the family returns home, and the husband is here in Congress. Then the wife and family are here again. I do not think that type of living lends to good feeling and for sound legislation at this time of the year. However, I am not self-serving in this proposal, so I shall make that suggestion.

Mr. PASTORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. First, I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Washington, who is one of the Senate's most eligible bachelors, for taking it upon himself to plead the cause of us who have marital and family responsibilities. There are those of us who are separated from our families during these difficult days, arduous especially in the circumstances under which we are working at the moment. I think it is quite refreshing, after what we have experienced, for a period of a week, to have one our brethren who is not within our category of the family group to rise and espouse our cause in the eloquent way in which he has spoken.

I congratulate the Senator from Washington upon his splendid idea. He could not have chosen a more propitious time to promote our thinking on the important problem of using our time to greatest advantage so as to perform our duties here most expeditiously in the best interests of the people of the country.

Having witnessed the spectacle we have experienced for the past week or so, and the time-consuming tactics involved it becomes more essential than ever to use our time most advantageously, so that we may work on legislation calmly and patiently for the benefit of the people of the Nation.

I congratulate the Senator from Washton, and I thank him for yielding.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I also wish to encourage the Senator from Washington to continue his work on the very grave problem which he has so well outlined. I congratulate him upon the remedies which he has suggested. I myself am a convert to the idea of doing something toward regulating the sessions of the Senate, either by splitting the sessions or dividing the year into segments of work, so that we may better accommodate ourselves to the responsibilities and problems which confront us every year.

I am not in the category of those who have children attending school, but I am aware of the burden which is placed upon the children of Members of Congress. It is almost unbearable, and it is unnecessary. It should not be necessary to submit to it any longer. I hope the Senator from Washington will continue his excellent work in this field.

Mr. MAGNUSON. What the Senator from Mississippi has said is a part of the problem. I believe the real need today is to be able to adjust the fiscal responsibility of Congress. Congress, under the Constitution, has the control of the purse strings, which means the power to levy taxes and appropriate money. Therefore, these functions should be regulated in such a way that Congress can examine into and act upon them separately. I think much better work will be accomplished if Congress will function in that way.

The Budget Bureau in 1958—last year—when I submitted the proposal to them for their consideration, examined into it very carefully and expressed a wish to review it further. The Bureau of the Budget stated that the proposal raised very important questions which should be explored. They said:

> All of us can readily agree, I am sure, that there is considerable room for improvement in our budgetary and appropriation process.

So, Mr. President, even the Bureau of the Budget has become interested in such a proposal as this.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, a statement I have prepared on this subject, which is similar to the one I made a couple of years ago on a bill to create fiscal and legislative sessions of Congress. Several editorials have been written about it. One which poses some of the questions I myself pose was published in the New York Journal of Commerce. I ask unanimous consent that that editorial also be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

BILL TO CREATE A FISCAL AND A LEGISLATIVE SESSION OF CONGRESS

Inflation is one of the major problems facing the country today. Federal spending is a major factor in the trend toward rising costs since National Government collects and spends around 20 percent of the gross national income. It is not only important, but also necessary that Congress be in a better position to judge our national fiscal policies, to eliminate waste, and to provide for necessary spending on the most economic basis possible.

With this in mind I am introducing a bill which would make possible the achievement of these objectives. Under the current system in which Congress must deal with measures like civil rights one week—and an appropriation bill the next—it is impossible for an adequate job to be accomplished. Moreover, toward the end of a session like this one it is pressed by the departments to get something passed so that salaries and Government obligations can be met.

Mine is a threefold bill whch will (1) provide for a regular annual fiscal session to be separate from the session on all legislative matters; (2) establish the calendar year as the Government's fiscal year; and (3) provide Federal accounting procedures which would insure a businesslike appraisal of the Government's fiscal position in the light of the President's annual budget.

In the fiscal session of Congress—beginning annually on the second Monday of November and extending until December 31—committees other than appropriations in either House, might still meet, hold hearings, or conduct studies and investigations of matters under their respective jurisdictions, but ordinarily the only measures which would be introduced, reported upon, or enacted would be money bills.

On the other hand, the present regular session of Congress beginning on January 3—and any special sessions—would ordinarily be confined to consideration of all other nonfiscal measures. These would be known as legislative sessions.

Treaties, nominations, or other measures whose consideration during a fiscal session is requested by the President as being in the national interest would provide certain necessary exceptions to the division of congressional business between legislative and fiscal sessions. Also action might be taken on required deficiency appropriations during a legislative session.

I view inauguration of fiscal sessions the logical and most practical solution to the ever-increasing problem of thorough and timely action by Congress on appropriation bills. We in Congress are as responsible as the executive branch to the Nation for the wise and prudent disposition of public funds.

Sandwiching work on money bills into ordinary legislative business makes it almost impossible to meet that national responsibility. By contrast, the fiscal session plan will permit Congress periodically to devote its entire energies to these important matters without the pressure, haste, and confusion which has become too often associated with the consideration of money measures.

Title I of the bill sets up the fiscal session and establishes the difference between this and the legislative session.

Title II of the bill amends title 5, section 156 of the United States Code, and other related statutes, to establish the calendar year as the Governments fiscal year—thus putting the Federal accounting cycle in step with universal business practice. The bill provides that the first calendar-fiscal year will be 1960, commencing immediately after the first fiscal session in November and December of 1959. Appropriations only for the period July 1 to December 31, 1959, would be made during the session of Congress beginning January 3, 1959.

Title III affects changes in the time of submission and content of the President's budget amending section 201 of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921. Beginning in 1959 the budget for the succeeding fiscal year would be required to be submitted on or before July 15—or approximately 4 months prior to the beginning of the fiscal session during which it will be passed upon. The benefits of having the budget published and on record well in advance of its consideration by Congress are obvious.

In order that the fiscal position of the Government be reflected in a more businesslike manner this title requires the annual budget to incorporate two features not now required by law (1) a showing of the amount of proposed appropriations and expenditures which are reimbursable to the Treasury, and (2) a report on the total capital assets of the Government and their value, as of the end of the last completed fiscal year.

These items are essential to give Congress and the American people a true picture of the Federal financial position. The effect of the size of the budget as a whole cannot be properly analyzed unless some overall differentiation is made between absolute and reimbursable expenses. Even more important is the long-overdue requirement that some accounting be kept of our Government's capital assets.

It is almost impossible to make an intelligent appraisal of the Nation's solvency in terms of debt alone for the same reasons that the indebtedness of a business or of an individual means nothing unless we also know something of their assets. The Federal Government today has the ownership of billions upon billions of dollars of lands, minerals, buildings, capital goods, supplies, and equipment. Inconceivable as it may seem to an outsider—no official accounting has ever been required to show the current value of this property—against which to measure the amount of our national debt. Surely this reform is now—more than ever—demanded.

The present measure is sincerely recommended for approval by the Senate.

[From the New York Journal of Commerce, Sept. 3, 1957]

TIME OUT FOR MONEY?

The 1st session of the 85th Congress has adjourned, leaving behind it a meager record of accomplishment. The President is disappointed, and well he might be.

Many aspects of his legislative program never saw the light of day in the session just ended. Moreover, some probably won't in the second session, either. The reasons are manifold. They include differences between the White House and Congress and differences within Congress, not to speak of the embattled civil rights issue which, in the course of the 1st session, stalled the legislative apparatus to an unusual degree.

But other Congresses have had their deep-rooted differences and their burning issues as well. Few in recent years have moved into the end of a session with a sense of well-organized accomplishment and without a backlog of unfinished business. As any 'teener sitting in the gallery could observe, the extraordinary manner in which the legislators go about their daily work hardly makes for efficiency.

A real question is whether the difficulties under which Congress works are not of the built-in variety. Does it really make sense to go on sandwiching legislative business-like civil rights in with appropriation bills in a confused and permanent merry-go-round? Can Congress do justice either to its legislative work or to the special and complex problems raised by Federal spending decisions by this helter-skelter, hit-or-miss approach.

We doubt it. And so does the author of an imaginative plan which appeared in the form of a bill just as the first session wound up its business. It is entitled the "Proposed Fiscal Act of 1957."

Introduced by Senator WARREN MAGNUSON, Democrat, of Washington, S. 2846 would go so far as to inaugurate a new special congressional session each year, beginning in November and convened just for the money bill part of the job. This separate fiscal session of Congress would supplement the regular session, in which legislative matters, exclusive of money bills, would be concentrated upon.

The theory underlying this approach is that the legislators need to devote their entire energies to the disposition of public funds if they are to shoulder the responsibility which they share with the Executive for the wise and prudent use of those funds.

There can be no mistake that a very radical change from present practices would attend the implementation of S. 2846. One effect would be to permit shifting the time for the President to submit his budget from January to mid-July. To accommodate the new procedure, it is proposed that the Government drop the present fiscal year, which runs from one midyear to another, and adopt a calendar year basis.

Presumably, this would mean that Congress, meeting in January, would proceed to act upon the legislative program proper after receiving the President's state of the Union address and Economic Report. By July 15, the President would submit his budget, based upon the legislative actions.

But the money bills would not be considered until the fiscal session, beginning the second Monday in November and lasting through December 31. The new fiscal year would begin in January, and Congress would then enter the new session, commencing once again the consideration of a new legislative program sans money bills.

So radical an innovation as the Magnuson bill contemplates is not likely to win friends overnight. Whether it will even get to first base is a question.

But it needs discussion and thought, if only because of the central idea of concentrating during a particular time and with special procedure upon the intricate but vastly important money bills, which, after all, serve as the conveyor belts for taxpayer money. Even more important, perhaps, is the opportunity which would be provided for Congress to look at appropriations as a whole after the legislative program as a whole has been bundled up. This last point is of the utmost importance.

While S. 2846 is certainly not the whole answer and, perhaps, may not even be a partially correct one, it focuses major aspects of the problem and, by its sheer boldness, may well push thinking off dead center. Even a cursory reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reveals the disorganization inherent in present legislative methods. Senator MAGNUSON is to be commended for having extricated himself from the fracas sufficiently to suggest that this is not only a helluva way to run a railroad but no way to run the Nation's business.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, other editorials have been written on this subject. A few students of government have looked into this matter and have made suggestions and proposed changes. But my purpose today is to bring the matter before the Senate again. I thought this was an appropriate time to discuss it again, in the hope that all of us who have similar feelings about the problem might think about it, and then in January we might hold hearings on it before the appropriate committee or committees, in the hope that positive action may be taken.

It should not be necessary for us to stay in session all summer and privately complain, as perhaps all of us do, that we ought to do something about our own situation.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks made by the Senator from Washington. I congratulate him upon bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. What he has said, based upon his long years of experience and wisdom, is certainly impressive to me. In the short time I have been in the Senate, some of the same ideas have occurred to me. I had even gone so far as to have a concurrent resolution drafted and had expected to offer it in the Senate. But I am happy to see that the Senator from Washington, in his bill, has touched on the points I had in mind, and I am very happy to support the bill. I hope the Senate will do something more about this problem than merely talk about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

AUTHORIZATION TO COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO SUBMIT REPORTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary may submit sundry reports on bills ordered to be reported by the Judiciary Committee at its meeting today, including the immigration bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, my purpose in taking the floor this afternoon is to send to the desk eight proposals for printing under the rule, to amend Senate bill 2391, the so-called civil rights bill, now pending before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, these amendments include three proposals to which I wish to invite the atttention of the Senate specifically. Two were recommended this morning by the Civil Rights Commission. They deal with the preservation of registration and voting records for a period of 5 years, and restraints on voting registrars who deprive Negroes or others similarly circumstanced of the right to vote.

The third proposal is a substitute for a part of title 3, which was fought over in 1957. It embodies the intervention idea, enabling the Attorney General to intervene in suits at his discretion. It has an analogy in other phases of the law at this time.

I point out that the report of the Civil Rights Commission, which has been released today, is in my opinion a well-reasoned, middle-of-the-road document, proposing some solid, hard-headed recommendations drawn up by a bipartisan group representing all sections of the country and dedicated to the securing of constitutional rights for all citizens. I do not consider it radical or inflammatory.

The Commission is a six-man body, composed of three members from the South—Virginia, Florida, and Texas—and a member each from Indiana, Michigan, and the District of Columbia. Yet with respect to the two recommendations for which I am submitting amendments, there was not a single dissent.

These recommendations were the outgrowth of hearings before the Commission in connection with restraints and restrictions on voting.

With respect to a more controversial recommendation, No. 5, which would have the President appoint temporary Federal registrars to register persons to vote in Federal elections who are being deprived of the right to register, the only Commission member to dissent was John S. Battle, former Governor of Virginia. Governor Battle said in his own dissent that "substantial numbers of citizens under State registration and election laws are being denied the right to register, and thus the right to vote, by reason of their race or color."

I am studying the drafting of an amendment with respect to this recommendation as well, which I shall submit later.

I close by emphasizing the point that here was a representative Commission composed in part of some distinguished men from the South. It found itself pretty much of one mind with respect to two facts, first, that there was deprivation of the right to vote; and, second, that something very material must be done about it.

EXPANDED AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH PROGRAM

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the House has passed a modified version of Senate bill 690 which provides a sound and constructive approach for agricultural research. This bill has been greatly improved, in that it gives proper balance between marketing utilization and production research. It establishes necessary machinery for increasing the effectiveness of our agricultural research program. This proposed legislation will benefit both farmers and consumers, and will greatly strengthen our agricultural economy. I hope the Senate will pass this bill at this session.

Research may not have seemed so important 20 years ago. That was before the world visualized space satellites, Salk vaccine, atomic energy, and traveling cross-country by commercial jet in 4½ hours. That was before the Government started spending money on intercontinental ballistic missiles, or shooting men into space. Today, research holds the key to progress; and in the case of agriculture, it is indispensable.

Unfortunately, agriculture has lagged far behind industry in the application of research. American industry is now expanding its research programs at a rate of almost $1 billion a year, and is reaping the startling results we read about almost daily in the press. But research in agriculture is progressing at a horse-drawn pace, and is rapidly falling behind the rate of development needed to sustain a changing agriculture.

In providing research assistance, the Government gives major attention to nonagricultural needs. Agriculture 20 years ago received about 40 cents of each Federal research dollar. It now gets less than 3 cents of this dollar. Of course, we cannot reduce research expenditures in the vital areas of national defense, public health, space exploration, and atomic power. But agriculture is still one of our big problems and a very vital part of our economy. We must do everything to insure our country's health and strength through efficient and economical farming.

We can greatly improve the efficiency in our Federal research program for agriculture by this bill, which provides, first, a balanced research effort, with emphasis where and when it is needed; second, imaginative and independent program appraisal, to insure effectiveness; and, third, coordinated and determined administration.

This proposed legislation offers a unique approach for bringing about proper balance in research and independent program appraisal, and will work toward improving research administration and strengthening the overall research effort.

The bill has two major features. First, and most important, is the establishment of an Agricultural Research and Development Commission as an independent agency in the executive branch of Government.

Establishment of the Commission is the most realistic way to achieve the coordination and direction which today are so seriously lacking in agricultural research. The seven-member body, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, would review the total agricultural research effort and research programs of individual commodities. It would then recommend to Congress and the Secretary of Agriculture necessary changes in the research program.

Second, the bill will give additional authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to handle research contracts and grants more efficiently. Present law discourages qualified private organizations from undertaking Government research contracts for agricultural research and grants, due to redtape and unnecessary limitations.

Laws governing the use of public patents would also be liberalized, to encourage greater commercial use of discoveries made through Government-sponsored research. In addition, commercial use would be encouraged by direct sales promotion of these research results.

Mr. President, this bill, which has been given long and careful study by some of the most qualified agricultural minds, is a major step in developing a sound and forward-looking agricultural research policy. It is supported by national farm and commodity organizations. It is my firm conviction that this measure will greatly strengthen research, and will result in greater efficiency in the production, marketing and utilization of agricultural commodities. I am most hopeful that this agricultural research bill will receive the unanimous approval of the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the body of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the report of the Commission on Civil Rights.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ERVIN ON REPORT OF COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Before discussing the report of the Commission on Civil Rights, I wish to make certain relevant observations.

SOLUTION OF RACIAL PROBLEMS

When all is said, racial problems can be solved only by good will, intelligence, and patience on the local level where men and women live, move, and have their being. Their solution cannot be dictated from above, either by dictators holding executive offices, or dictators occupying legislative offices, or dictators wearing judicial robes.

COMPULSORY INTEGRATION

For this and other reasons, I disagree with those who seek to compel the involuntary association of the races by executive action, judicial decree, or legislative fiat. Despite assertions by sincere persons, professional agitators, and political opportunists to the contrary, racial segregation is not the product of racial prejudice. It results from the exercise of a most precious American right—the freedom to select one's own associates. Observations in the North, the South, the East, and the West show that whenever Americans are at liberty to select their own associates, they virtually always select as their associates members of their own race. This is not strange because it harmonizes with the basic law of nature that like seeks like.

Compulsory integration is fundamentally wrong because it robs the people affected by it of the freedom to select their own associates.

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

The constitutional and legal systems of America are the finest products of human experience and wisdom, and should be preserved at all costs for the benefit of all Americans of all races and all generations.

It is high time for Americans of all races in all sections of the country to wake up to the fact that advocates of the major proposals for civil rights legislation are trying to sell their constitutional and legal birthrights for a sorry mess of political pottage. This is true for the very simple reason that all major civil rights proposals are repugnant to our constitutional and legal systems.

The men who framed our constitutional and legal systems comprehended in full measure the everlasting truth that no man or set of men can be safely trusted with governmental power of an unlimited nature. In consequence, they were determined, above all things, to establish a government of laws and not of men.

To prevent the exercise of arbitrary power by government, they inserted in the Constitution of the United States the doctrine of the separation of governmental powers.

They utilized this doctrine in a twofold way. They delegated to the Federal Government the powers necessary to enable it to discharge its functions as a central government, and they left to the States all other governmental powers. It was this use of the doctrine of the separation of powers which prompted Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase to make this memorable remark in his opinion in Texas v. White: "The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible union, composed of indestructible States."

In their other utilization of the doctrine of the separation of powers, the framers of our constitutional and legal systems vested the power to make laws in the Congress, the power to execute laws in the President, and the power to interpret laws in the Supreme Court of the United States and such inferior courts as the Congress might establish.

Time and space do not permit me to analyze in detail the provisions of the numerous proposals for civil rights legislation. It is indisputable, however, that the provisions of the major proposals in this field cannot possibly be reconciled with the fundamentals of our constitutional and legal systems.

This is true for these reasons:

1. They undertake to concentrate in the Federal Government the power to supervise and control all relations between the States and their citizens. In so doing, they are utterly repugnant to the constitutional principle that our indestructible Union is composed of indestructible States.

2. They single out certain groups of Americans on account of their race and undertake to make them the special favorites of the laws. In so doing, they are utterly repugnant to the basic American concepts that ours is a Government of laws rather than a Government of men, and that courts are created to administer equal and exact justice according to certain and uniform laws applying alike to all men in like situations.

3. They single out certain groups of Americans and undertake to confer upon them so-called civil rights by robbing State and local officials and all other Americans involved in civil-rights disputes of the basic and invaluable constitutional and legal safeguards created by the Constitution and the Congress to protect all Americans from bureaucratic and judicial tyranny.

NEW LEGISLATION UNNECESSARY

A study of existing statutes shows that new legislation in this field is wholly unnecessary.

Sections 1981 to 1992 of title 42 of the United States Code confer upon all Americans legal and equitable remedies sufficient to enforce all of their civil rights. To be sure, advocates of new legislation in this field do not like these statutes because they require that the rights devolving upon each American as a citizen or a man shall "be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected."

The concept of uniform laws is abhorrent to those who would single out certain groups and make them the special favorites of the laws.

Section 241 of title 18 of the United States Code provides heavy criminal penalties for those who "conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same."

Section 242 of title 18 of the United States Code provides criminal penalties for any State or local official who "willfully subjects any inhabitant of any State, Territory or District, to the deprivation of any rights, privileges or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

Under these two criminal statutes, the Department of Justice can prosecute in a Federal court any State or local official who willfully denies any qualified person the right to register or vote, or any other right secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States. To be sure, the burden would rest upon the Department of Justice to prove such State or local official to be guilty by the testimony of credible witnesses having personal knowledge of the truth of the charge against such official.

Advocates of new legislation in this field do not like these statutes because they would deny to State and local officials legal rights which they are willing to accord to persons charged with murder, smuggling, dope peddling, counterfeiting, and other crimes.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION

Although I opposed the creation of the Commission on Civil Rights, I nevertheless entertained the hope that the Commission would suggest something new and constructive in the field of racial relations. The report which has been released by the Commission today has robbed me of this hope.

The report is not a report in any real sense of the term. This is true because the report has many authors who entertain and express differing views. The major portion of the report is written by the staff of the Commission. The other portions of the report are written by individual Commissioners or groups of Commissioners.

The portion of the report written by the staff of the Commission consists of the same old cliches which have been used for years by those who make the advocacy of Civil Rights legislation and compulsory racial integration a profession.

The real character of the portion of the report written by the staff of the Commission is clearly revealed by the following statements of members of the Commission.

1. The statement of Commissioner Battle that "the report is not an impartial, factual statement, but rather, in large part, an argument in advocacy of preconceived ideas in the field of race relations."

2. The statement of Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton that the portion of the report dealing with public education "is to a large extent argumentative and colored by the authors' views on the sociological and philosophical aspects of the school integration problem."

3. The statement of Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton that "some parts of the foregoing report are argumentative, with suggestions keyed to integration rather than housing," and "suggest a fixed program of mixing the races anywhere and everywhere regardless of the wishes of either race and particular problems involved."

Time and space preclude me from discussing the report in detail. For this reason, I shall confine my observations to the proposal that the Constitution of the United States be amended so as to deprive the States of their present constitutional power to prescribe the qualifications of voters; the proposal that all colleges, both public and private, be deprived of all Federal grants to coerce them into integrating their student bodies; the proposal that the Commission on Civil Rights be made a permanent governmental agency so that its staff may assist in bringing about the integration of all public schools in Southern States; and the proposal that all federally assisted housing be integrated. I wish to note at this point that Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton, who are far more familiar with the South than the other Commissioners, entered vigorous dissents to these proposals.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The Constitution provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress" (art. II, clause 2); that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures" (art. I, sec. 2); and that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for 6 years. * * * The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures" (amendment 17, clause 1).

If history shows anything, it shows that the framers of the Constitution were wise in permitting the States to prescribe the qualifications for voters. On one occasion, Congress rejected the wisdom of the Founding Fathers in this respect and undertook to let the National Government act in this field. This congressional folly resulted in the tragic era now known as Reconstruction, which culminated in the shameful episode in which Samuel J. Tilden, the duly elected candidate for the office, was robbed of the Presidency.

Despite this sad historical experience, it is proposed that the Constitution of the United States be amended so as to vest in every person of the required age and place of residence not actually confined in an insane asylum or a prison an absolute right to vote in any election held for any purpose in any political subdivision anywhere in the 50 States constituting the United States, even though he be an idiot or an unreformed felon under conviction for a crime involving moral turpitude. When all is said, the only reason assigned for the proposal that the States be robbed of the right to prescribe intelligence tests for voters and barred from depriving unconfined idiots and unconfined felons from the elective franchise is simply this: That it is alleged that in a comparatively few areas of the country supposedly qualified persons have been denied the right to register and vote, and that it would be easier to establish the truth of such allegations in the future if the only qualifications required of voters were the possession of a physical body, with or without intelligence or character, plus an attained age and a fixed place of residence.

For Congress and the States to heed this proposal for such a constitutional amendment would be about as sensible as using an atomic bomb to destroy a few rats.

As I have already pointed out, there are now sufficient Federal statutes to prevent or punish any provable charges that any qualified person is being wrongfully denied the right to register and vote in any of the 165,115 voting precincts in the 50 States comprising the Union.

THE PROPOSED DENIAL OF FEDERAL GRANTS

Coercion to compel conformity or to stifle dissent is inexcusable, whether exerted by individuals or by Government. For this reason, I deplore the proposal that executive agencies and departments of the Federal Government withhold all grants to colleges, both public and private, to coerce their administrators into integrating their student bodies. It is to be remembered that Congress makes these grants to facilitate the education of the boys and girls who attend these colleges in the capacity of students and who have no control whatever over their administration. This proposal seeks to visit the supposed sins of the administrators upon the innocent students with a vengeance.

THE PROPOSAL RELATING TO SECONDARY PUBLIC SCHOOLS

In an able opinion in Briggs v. Elliott, 132 Fed. Supp. 776, the late Chief Judge John J. Parker of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth District, one of the ablest and most distinguished jurists America has ever known, explained "exactly what the Supreme Court has decided" in the so-called school desegregation cases. Judge Parker said: "It has not decided that the Federal courts are to take over or regulate the public schools of the States. It has not decided that the States must mix persons of different races in the schools or must require them to attend schools or must deprive them of the right of choosing the schools they attend.

What it has decided, and all that it has decided, is that a State may not deny to any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains. This, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the State may not do directly or indirectly; but if the schools which it maintains are open to children of all races, no violation of the Constitution is involved even though the children of different races voluntarily attend different schools, as they attend different churches. Nothing in the Constitution or in the decision of the Supreme Court takes away from the people freedom to choose the schools they attend. The Constitution, in other words, does not require integration. It merely forbids discrimination. It does not forbid such segregation as occurs as the result of voluntary action. It merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation. The 14th amendment is a limitation upon the exercise of power by the State or State agencies, not a limitation upon the freedom of individuals."

After acknowledging Judge Parker's interpretation of the so-called school desegregation cases to be sound, the portion of the report written by the staff of the Commission forthwith forsakes Judge Parker's sound interpretation for its own erroneous interpretation that the cases require the complete desegregation of all public schools in the South regardless of the wishes of the people of both races in particular districts, and urges that the Commission on Civil Rights be made a permanent agency to assist in bringing such desegregation to pass. I cannot refrain from observing at this point that the central theme of the portion of the report written by the staff of the Commission is the desirability of perpetuating the Commission on Civil Rights and the jobs of the members of its staff.

THE PROPOSAL TO INTEGRATE ALL FEDERALLY ASSISTED HOUSING

The sociological bent of the staff of the Commission on Civil Rights is disclosed by many portions of the report written by it. For example, it deplores the fact that many nonwhite American families live in second-hand homes—a statement equally applicable to the overwhelming majority of all white American families, both rich and poor. The portions of the report written by the staff of the Commission relating to housing recommend that "all federally assisted housing, including housing constructed with the assistance of Federal mortgage insurance or loan guarantees as well as federally aided public housing and urban renewal projects," be integrated, and thus supports the observation of Vice Chairman Storey and Commissioners Battle and Carlton that such parts of the report are "keyed to integration rather than housing," and "suggest a fixed program of mixing the races anywhere and everywhere regardless of the wishes of either race." As these gentlemen state, suggestions of this nature "if carried out in full, will result in delay and in many cases the defeat of adequate housing." This is undoubtedly true because Senators and Congressmen who believe that Americans should have the freedom to select their own associates are not likely to support a federally assisted housing program which is diverted from its primary purpose of providing shelter for American families to that of producing compulsory association of the races.

The statements in the portion of the report of the staff deploring blockbusting, expressing concern for the legitimate interest of white neighborhoods, and advocating expanding Negro residential areas seem to justify the inference that the staff of the Commission tolerates, if it does not actually favor, the continuance of conditions now prevailing in many American cities, which were succinctly described a few days ago in the following words in a letter which one New Yorker wrote to other New Yorkers, and which I have been granted the liberty of using: "May I ask whether we really do have integration here in New York, or whether we have integration only for poor people? That is, for the people who can't afford to move to the suburbs and can't afford to send their children to private schools. Are there any so-called champions of civil rights who now live in integrated areas or whose children are attending integrated schools?"

When all is said, the report of the Commission leaves me with the abiding conviction that the staff of the Commission is inseparably wedded to the propositions that Americans ought not to have the freedom to select their own associates, and that all possible governmental powers ought to be diverted from their primary functions to that of compelling the involuntary association of the races.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission in its report are both extreme and shocking. The report in itself is a mere blueprint for complete federalization of all walks of life. The far-reaching proposals would extinguish more rights than they would protect.

If carried out, the proposals would effectively destroy the relationship between the States and the Federal Government in the field of suffrage, and even would provide for registration of voters by Federal officials in some instances. The Federal Government would assume virtually complete control in the field of education. Furthermore, there would be complete Federal control over all housing for which any Federal funds have been used in any way in years past.

The only step remaining to assure complete federalization of the Nation would be enactment of an FEPC bill to bring all employment under Federal control.

In education, the role of the Federal Government has been one of leadership and assistance, with some financial aid in limited fields. As outstanding examples, we can point with pride to our land grant colleges and our extension service and vocational education, as well as grants for research.

Yet the Commission recommends that we reverse completely this role of leadership and assistance, to one of bribery, coercion and punishment, resulting in the absolute destruction of these worthy programs. Coercion in the field of education has never been—and I trust it never shall be—the policy of the Congress.

Most of the recommendations in this report are clearly visionary and impractical. There are remedies within present law for any evils, real or imaginary, about which complaint has been made.

The division of thought among the members themselves shows how unwise and futile would be any attempt to enact Federal legislation in these fields.

Commissioner Battle has accurately described the report as being "neither impartial nor factual, but a mere argument in the field of race relations."

I am confident these unprecedented recommendations will be rejected flatly by the American people and the Congress.

All thinking Americans will arise to the challenge. Thus, in sounding the alarm, this report will have served its only useful purpose.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the report of the Commission on Civil Rights is unparalleled for the arrogance and calculation by which it proposes to extend Federal power over the intimate lives and inalienable liberties of the American people.

It is confirmation of the worst fears of those of us who opposed its creation 2 years ago.

The effect of carrying out its recommendations—the worst, of which do not even carry the endorsement of a majority of the Commission members—would be to perpetuate that agency as an unconstitutional instrument of meddling and intimidation, from which no facet of the lives, fortunes, and property of all 177 million Americans would be immune.

The recommendation that Federal registrars be appointed to determine who is qualified to vote and who is not qualified to vote is unconstitutional on its face. Under the clear wording of paragraph 1, section 2, article I of the Constitution of the United States, the State is sovereign within the limitations of the 15th and 19th amendments as to the qualifications of voters.

Should the constitutional amendment proposed by three of the Commission members be submitted by Congress and ratified by the States, idiots, lunatics, and convicted felons would be permitted to vote. In fact, the proposed language is so broad that if a murderer managed to escape from prison on election day and make his way to the polls, he, too, would be permitted to cast a ballot.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. TALMADGE. I am delighted to yield to my friend, the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Some States have laws which do not permit a person to have assistance when he goes into a voting registration booth. It is very difficult to say how such a civil rights proposal would be administered when a blind man came to vote, if he was not allowed to have assistance at the time when he was required to register and to vote.

Mr. TALMADGE. That is entirely correct; and I may add that the same would be true of idiots and lunatics.

Mr. ERVIN. And the only excuse that is given in connection with the proposal to rob the States of their right to prescribe intelligence tests for voters and bar them from depriving unconfined idiots and unconfined felons from voting is the allegation that there has been some deprivation of the right to vote, and that it would be easier to establish that a person has been wrongfully denied the right to vote, if the only qualifications a person has to meet in order to enjoy the right to vote is the physical possession of a body, with or without intelligence or character, plus the attainment of a certain age and a fixed place of residence.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the able Senator from North Carolina has summarized the matter correctly.

Mr. ERVIN. But that is precisely what the report recommends.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator from North Carolina is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Georgia, under the 3-minute limitation, has expired.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the proposal that the Commission be given authority to bring about integration of schools has in it the seeds of unprecedented strife and chaos. Such efforts could only result in tension and violence in the States of the South, comparable to that which we now are witnessing in the metropolitan areas of States in other regions which for many years have followed policies of integration.

The proposed formula for forced race-mixing in public and private housing not only would nullify our constitutional guarantees of security of person and property, but also would, by resorting to the authority of executive orders, bypass established legislative procedure.

Such attempts already have been made in metropolitan areas such as New York and Chicago, and all of us have seen the sorry results. In Chicago there has been violence, arson, and lawlessness which have required the full-time attention of hundreds of policemen, in order to preserve order.

It is inconceivable how anyone could believe that if such a system cannot work in the integrated cities of the North, Midwest, and Far West, it could by any stretch of the imagination be successful in the South, where segregation is the mutually accepted social pattern.

Mr. President, I am confident that if the American people knew of the dictatorship and tyranny proposed in the report of the Commission on Civil Rights, they would rise up in righteous indignation, and would demand, as one, that this Congress not only not extend the life of the Commission, but, rather, that Congress abolish it forthwith.

I agree wholeheartedly with the dissenting opinion of Commissioner John S. Battle that the report is "an argument in advocacy of preconceived ideas in the field of race relations"; and I wish to state that I expect to have much more to say on the subject of this Commission and its future when the matter comes before this Senate for determination.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SEATO

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today marks the fifth anniversary of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization—SEATO. The anniversary symbolizes a unique mark of progress in efforts between Far Eastern and Western nations to cooperate in promoting peace and security.

Freedom in the world, and particularly in southeast Asia, has a better chance of survival, because of the existence of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

We recognize, however, that the 8-member organization—comprised of the United States, Great Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Thailand, and the Philippines—greatly needs strengthening.

In the days ahead, we can expect that SEATO will face the full gamut of Communist pressures—from the "sword" to the "carrot"—to spread their influence among the Asian nations, as well as around the globe. These tactics will include infiltration, subversion, alternating threats and promises, treaty making and breaking, propaganda barrages, and other attempts to increase their spheres of influence and control.

The Communist willingness to flagrantly violate the territorial integrity of other nations—exemplified by the Communist action in Laos, India, and Tibet—adequately demonstrates the scope of the ever-greater challenges and threats with which the Organization will be confronted.

Indeed, the stepped up, multipronged offensive by the Communists in Asia may well create for SEATO a "test for its life."

SEATO AID FOR LAOS?

If the United Nations fail to act quickly enough in response to the appeal of Laos for help, the next logical step may well be a request directly to SEATO for assistance.

Pledged by its own charter to act within the principles of the United Nations, the organization may, nevertheless, act independently of the United Nations, if that is required.

Foresightedly, the SEATO nations have already met to consider the factors in the situation.

Unfortunately, the Soviets again are acting as obstructionists to United Nations action; they are threatening to block the effort to obtain the facts in regard to the Laos crisis.

With the threat of the veto overhanging U.N. action, it is to be hoped that SEATO will grasp the opportunity and will demonstrate to the world its willingness and ability to be of all possible assistance.

In celebrating the fifth anniversary of SEATO, its member nations must, I believe, rededicate themselves and their resources to dealing effectively with the swelling tide of Communist aggressiveness in Asia, as well as around the globe. The degree to which they accomplish their objective may well determine whether the future of Asia is free or slave.

Mr. President, right now there is a real challenge to SEATO. In the morning newspapers we notice articles which state that the Communist group in the United Nations threatens to veto proposed action by the United Nations to send a group to obtain the facts in Laos. SEATO is not bound by any such provision; it can really "go to town" now, and can demonstrate what I believe it is important that it demonstrate—namely, a determination to take action to put out the Communist fire in Laos.

FEDERAL DEBT MANAGEMENT AND INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the time is at hand for an objective look at the problems of our Nation's debt management. The time is at hand for a frank appraisal of our country's credit standing and its ability to finance its obligations in the difficult times of international crises that lie ahead.

It is regrettable that the House of Representatives has not approved the President's proposal to remove the arbitrary ceiling on interest rates payable on long-term Government bonds.

Since early 1958 the United States has lost $2.8 billion of gold to other countries: its foreign exchange position is not as strong; savings bonds redemptions are rising; long-term U.S. marketable bonds are at their lowest point; and now our Treasury is being forced to resort to a method of financing which can only contribute to new economic problems and increased inflationary pressures by the failure to act on the President's request for increasing the ceiling on interest rates on the Government's long-term debt.

Unless we face this problem squarely, we may endanger the continued prosperity and well-being of our Nation and may endanger the record-breaking prosperity which we are now enjoying.

At stake in the President's proposal is the confidence of our people at home and of other free nations in the credit and fiscal integrity of the United States. If we permit an undermining of this confidence, it may lead to the weakening of our national security.

Our security depends, as we well know, not only upon our military strength, but also upon our fiscal integrity as well. Indeed, a healthy economy, enjoying real economic growth, is essential for the military and industrial capacity required to maintain our barriers against Communist aggression and to give the necessary confidence to our friends in other parts of the world that we have that capacity.

Every economic index reports rising levels of business activity, increased wages, and increased employment, with a gross national product approaching $500 billion annually.

Our free economy has recovered vigorously from the recession of last year. We are experiencing a true economic growth, and every indicator points to continued, steady progress ahead.

But the road ahead is not free from obstacles. The gravest danger to genuine economic growth and to real prosperity lies in inflation.

In the face of this ever-present danger, the House of Representatives has taken a grave step which I believe can only aggravate these pressures of inflation. The House has rejected the President's proposal to lift the arbitrary interest rate ceiling on the sale of Government bonds. It has failed to do so despite serious warnings issued by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and, more lately, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

This failure may gravely affect the security of this Nation, for as vital to our Nation's security as men and modern weapons is the confidence we can create in the United States Government on the part of our allies and other free nations abroad, as well as on the part of our people at home.

If the Treasury of the United States is hampered in financing its enormous obligations, that confidence is seriously impaired. If the Treasury must resort to unsound methods in order to meet its obligations, its credit and international confidence in the U.S. economy may be seriously injured.

A stable economy, one which is not hampered by constant erosion, through inflation, is vital to our Nation's security.

We know that there are many factors which contribute to the dangers of inflation. These include deficit Government financing, the wage-price spiral, improper debt management. The action of the House compels the Government to resort to short-term debt financing, and thus leads ultimately to improper debt management.

The Secretary of the Treasury has repeatedly stated that the interest rate ceiling must be lifted if the Government is to continue long-term financing of the national debt. The rejection of the President's proposal means, in effect, that the Government more and more will have to resort to short-term financing, which ultimately becomes similar to increasing the speed of printing presses. When the printing presses are speeded, the value of our dollar becomes less and the cost of our commodities becomes greater.

Money is a commodity. Like any other commodity, it is affected by supply and demand. It experiences the normal fluctuation price of any commodity in a free economy.

The President's request for removal of the 4¼-percent limit—a limit that is now completely out of line with market realities—is not a request to raise interest rates. Interest rates have already risen because of growing economic activity.

The request is for authority to permit the Treasury to compete in the money market and thus use the credit of the Government in a sound fashion. Just recently, because the Treasury was unable to sell bonds at a rate greater than 4¼ percent, it was forced to sell short-term notes and pay 4¾ percent interest in order to get its money.

Certainly we may expect that this will continue to be the case for some time to come. In fact, the net effect of the House action may create even higher interest rates in the short-term market.

Short-term money comes in large part from banks and corporations that temporarily have extra cash. It is used for temporary purposes—for self-liquidating investments, for the carrying of inventories, and other short-term needs. Long-term money, on the other hand, comes from savings, from insurance companies, pension funds—through companies and individuals. Some of it also comes from banks. Long-term loans are used for capital investments and for permanent increases in working capital.

There is always some flexibility between these two sources and the ultimate uses of money. Availability in excess of the needs for funds in the short-term area may lead to more long-term loans, and vice versa. Commercial banks and some of our other more flexible institutions make it possible to strike a balance if the price encourages such movement one way or the other.

Now that the price of long-term money has exceeded 4¼ percent, any movement of funds from short-term into the long-term market will be less likely. Since the Treasury will have to borrow in the short-term market to supply its needs, the price of short-term money will rise—in fact, it already has. And, we must never forget that long-term investments, though for the greater part institutional in character, directly represent personal savings by individuals. On the other hand, short-term lending is done largely by large corporations and commercial banks.

The decision of the House will thus help the large corporations and banks, because it increases interest rates they receive and, contrawise, it will injure the individual saver, the consumer, and the home owner who is able to save a little bit each month and put it into savings institutions and insurance. So it is the average citizen who will suffer by the refusal of the Congress to raise interest rates.

Finally, in refusing to lift the ceiling on the Government bond interest rate, there is a direct blow to the consumer, for it will add fuel to the fires of inflation and thus bring up the cost of living for every citizen.

This is demonstrated historically. If the Treasury sells bonds to the Federal Reserve System at pegged interest rates, we can expect an increase in the cost of living similar to that experienced after the last war, when that method of financing the national debt was used. For example, in the 5 years preceding March 1951, the Consumer Price Index rose from 78 to 110.3. When the interest rates were freed in the following 5 years, the cost of living rose only four points, or one-tenth as fast as it rose in the previous 5 years, when interest rates were pegged.

We want to encourage our citizens to save and to invest in our Nation's future. We must make it attractive for them to do so, and I am glad that legislation to this effect is now being considered by the Congress with relation to E- and H-bonds. This legislation will help to restore the savings bond program to the competitive position that it once held with relation to the savings institutions. Savings bonds which are held by millions of our citizens at the present time are not in a competitive position with other good investments as they once were. This legislation will help to make them so.

But this alone is not enough. I believe it is essential for Congress to make it possible for the Government to borrow its funds on a longer term basis than 5 years.

Congress must demonstrate that the United States is willing and able to preserve its fiscal integrity and to meet its responsibilities in the face of the greatest challenge ever to our freedom and our security and our leadership in the free world.

INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, on Wednesday, September 2, certain Senators entered into a colloquy in the Senate on the question of increasing the interest rate on Government bonds. During the course of this discussion an article by J. A. Livingston was "cussed" and discussed.

Mr. Livingston is the well-known economic commentator, whose syndicated column appears locally in the Washington Post, from which he was being quoted. He is also the distinguished financial editor of the Philadelphia Evening and Sunday Bulletin, who has been called upon time and again to testify before congressional committees, including the Joint Committee on the Economic Report.

Mr. Livingston does not need my defense. He is entirely capable of taking care of his own replies. I simply want to call to the attention of the Senate that his views and statements cannot be brushed aside lightly—they represent a considerable body of opinion.

I ask unanimous consent to include at this point in the RECORD his biography, which speaks for itself.

There being no objection, the biography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joseph Arnold Livingston: economist; A.B., University of Michigan, 1925; newspaper reporter, 1925–30; executive editor, New York Daily Investment News, 1931–34; public utility editor, Financial World, 1935; economist, Business Week, 1935–42; WPB and Office War Mobilization and Reconversion, 1942–45; began column, "Business Outlook," now syndicated in United States and Canada, 1945; financial editor, Philadelphia Record, 1946; business columnist, Washington Post, 1947; financial editor, Philadelphia Bulletin, 1948——. Member, intensive review committee of Secretary of Commerce to analyze the program of U.S. Bureau of the Census. Member, American Economic Association, American Statistical Association, Financial Analysts Philadelphia.

Office: Philadelphia Bulletin, Philadelphia.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, certain easy-money advocates, including, I regret to say, some Members of this body, adhere still to the outworn theology of the economists of the Keyserling-Nathan school, who, I think, could be correctly characterized, so far as the present days are concerned, as "Neanderthal economists." They learned the technique during the depression. It is the only technique they know. They want President Eisenhower to deal with prosperity the way Franklin Delano Roosevelt dealt with the depression. It is not the same. It will not work.

In order that we may consider the fiscally responsible side of the picture, in contrast with that presented by the easy-money advocates presented on the floor of the Senate the other day, I should like to associate myself with the views expressed by Mr. Livingston and by most of the financial experts who have expressed opinions on this subject.

The absurdity of Congress voting authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the public debt from $285 billion to $295 billion, and then fussing, fuming, and refusing to permit a discretionary increase in interest rates on bonds, is like the mother who gives her daughter an ample clothes allowance, but enjoins her from paying more than $7.50 for a dress, when the cheapest dress she can buy is $10.

Congress has told Secretary Anderson to base his 1959–60 financing on money market conditions which prevailed 40 years ago.

This is unrealistic and anachronistic. Any doubting Senator, before he votes on the President's request, ought to go to a bank and try to borrow long-term money at 4¼ percent.

I quote one of Livingston's poems on this subject:

> Congress, may I go into debt?
> Yes, Bob, name your target;
> Borrow whatever you have to get,
> But don't send bonds to market.

Mr. President, the root of the controversy is control versus freedom, Government intervention versus personal decision.

We have not yet learned how to control individuals, channel their energies, direct their decisions. We have not yet developed a foolproof way to decide the price of a loaf of bread, or the worth of an hour's work in the coal mines, or the rent of a home. But that, in effect, is what the advocates of cheap money, regulated money, are leading us to—regulation—though they may not realize or suspect it.

They feel that the Federal Reserve System can fix the price of money whenever and wherever it wants to do so. The fallacy of that was proved when Secretary of the Treasury Snyder wanted the Federal Reserve to peg Government bonds at 2½ percent. The insurance companies and banks dumped bonds on the Reserve banks because the 2½-percent rate was out of line with what they could earn on corporation bonds. They were not going to stint their policyholders in order to support the Government bond market.

What happened? The Reserve System got deluged with bonds. It was Atlas holding up the bond market, and the holders of Government bonds let Atlas "have it." Eventually, an accord between the Treasury and the Reserve System was worked out. The Federal Reserve stopped being Atlas. Senator DOUGLAS was one of the stanch defenders of the Reserve System in this fight.

If the Reserve Board were to follow the counsel of Senators CLARK, GORE and other easy-money advocates, it would become Atlas all over again. It would go into the market and buy Government bonds. Prices would rise. And holders would again let Atlas have it. The Reserve Board would be inundated by sales by banks, insurance companies, and other holders. The experience of the Commodity Credit Corp. would be recreated in Government bonds. Instead of holding wheat and corn and cotton, the Reserve Board would hold bonds.

Government bonds are not and have not been as attractive to buy as recent issues of corporation bonds. The interest-rate ceiling on Government bonds has been fixed by Congress at 4¼ percent. Corporation bond interest rates have no ceiling. So insurance companies, investment trusts, and so on, buy corporate new issues when they come out. The reasoning is this: If our economy is sound, the corporations are sound. There is not too great a difference in quality between a bond of a great corporation and the Government. Therefore, because the 4¼-percent ceiling is noncompetitive, the Treasury is forced out of the long-term bond market. Institutional investors go elsewhere with their money.

But this is only part of the problem as Senator DOUGLAS so well understood in his defense of the independence of the Reserve System in 1949 and 1950. When the Reserve Board buys Government securities, it introduces what has been aptly described as high-powered money into the banking and credit system. For example, if the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia buys $1 million of Government bonds, it thereupon creates $1 million of reserves for some commercial bank in Philadelphia, or Atlanta, or Chicago, or San Francisco. The banking system, in turn, can use that million dollars to make loans or buy securities up to $5 million. It can create $5 million in new deposits. Federal Reserve dollars are five times as powerful as ordinary dollars.

If the Reserve Board were to flood banks with extra reserves—for that is what these Senators advocate—then the banks, in turn, would be willing, anxious, and able to make additional loans. We would have our prosperity compounded into inflation.

This was a good policy during the depression. Then the Reserve banks evolved the technique of buying Government securities to make credit ample. That is an excellent device during periods of low employment, low prices, and economic distress. But it is a completely wrong policy during a period of economic prosperity which approaches boom proportions. These "loose money" Senators have a depression psychosis. They know what to do in a depression, but do not know how to deal with prosperity.

South American governments learned that they could not control the price of coffee. We learned in the twenties we could not control the world price of wheat. Price-fixing cartels have always failed. So must a congressional attempt to deep-freeze long-term Government bonds.

The U.S. Government bonds and notes are an international security. They are held all over the world. But if the rate on these securities is forced down artificially—if the price is forced up artificially—then the bonds will be dumped on this market, on the Federal Reserve Board, and when the dumping is all over, the Treasury will be worse off, not better off. Its securities, instead of being widely distributed, will have been resold to the Reserve Board. At the same time, the commercial banks will have excess reserves. They will be inclined to make loans freely; people having access to easy money, will speculate in all sorts of ways—not only in stocks and real estate, but also will take risks greater than they would assume with less credit in buying and selling businesses, in opening new businesses. It is easy to be venturesome during prosperity. Prosperity dulls caution and encourages daring, even recklessness. It leads men to take risks which they would not take in less encouraging times. They can see only success, not failure. Avarice—yearning for the success of others—leads to unwise ventures. Do we want to give full rein to such human failings?

If we do, then let us turn the Federal Reserve System into a backdoor printing press for the Treasury. That is what the easy-money advocates would do—whether they recognize it or not. Their program requires the Reserve to buy Treasury bonds and then issue its own money for them—all for the purpose of reducing the price of money to bank borrowers and to the Treasury.

All history says that cannot but fail. The 1789 revolutionary government of France tried to do this when it issued assignats on seized church lands. The assignats became worthless and now are to be found as collectors items among numismatists.

There are times when it is the Reserve Board's responsibility to make credit easy. It responded to this responsibility during the recession of 1948–49, during the recession of 1953–54, during the recession of 1957–58. It is Congress' responsibility to define the broad policy of the Reserve System, but it is not sensible, not smart, of Congress to get into the technique and minutiae of monetary management—telling the Reserve whether to buy bonds or sell bills. That is for market experts, not legislators.

If this were a period of economic difficulty, I could understand the desire for easy money and low interest rates. But the gross national product is at an all-time high, notwithstanding a nationwide steel strike. The Reserve Board is not throttling progress or expansion. It is just the other way. It has fostered the recovery from the recession and now we are in an era of historic prosperity. Premier Khrushchev will see not only how well off the American family is but also how successfully our system of economic choice operates. He will see that the Government does not have to intervene in every decision in order to have a robust economy and a rising standard of living. The proponents of easy money will, if they succeed, lead us to interest-rate fixing, then price fixing, then wage fixing. It is all of a piece. Can it be that they know not what they do? Or is a brass collar, regimented economy their aim?

No one has the wisdom to determine the proper interest rate of U.S. issues—neither the President, Secretary Anderson, William McChesney Martin, Jr., the Reserve Board Chairman, nor the Congress. Only the buyers and sellers of bonds can set the price in the marketplace—and it varies from day to day.

When the Government—through congressional decree—puts the rate too low, people will not buy Government bonds. We have recent evidence of that in the increase in redemptions and a decrease in sales in E- and H-bonds. Buyers of savings bonds are not experts in finance. Yet even they came to realize they were getting a bad deal. The President, therefore, asked Congress to eliminate the interest-rate ceiling on the E- and H-bonds to do justice to investors in these bonds. He also asked for elimination of the ceiling on marketable bonds, to give Secretary Anderson the tools he needs to do his job of financing the $290 billion debt. The President is not in favor of higher interest rates. He is in favor of fairness and justice to bond buyers and to the citizens of the country. It is Congress' task to give the Treasury flexibility in setting its interest rates.

The prices at which the Treasury sells bonds or other securities are public. If the prices are too low—if the rate is too high—this can be readily determined by comparing the rate with other securities. Instead, we have put the Treasury in the position of a grocer who tries to sell 4¼ pounds of beans for $1, when the grocer next door is selling 4½ or 4¾ pounds for the same price. It cannot be done.

One suspects that the loose-money advocates in Congress not only do not know money, they do not know beans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks in the RECORD sundry articles and editorials from Life magazine, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and Time magazine.

There being no objection, the editorials and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer]

UNSOLVED INTEREST PROBLEM

The bill to end the 3¼ percent ceiling on U.S. savings bond interest rates, which was passed by the House Friday and given speedy approval by the Senate Finance Committee Saturday, makes a necessary adjustment in the Government's borrowing authority but does not go far enough.

Legislation also is needed to remove the ceiling of 4¼ percent on interest rates for long-term marketable securities issued by the U.S. Treasury.

The Eisenhower administration seeks authority to raise the interest rates on series E and H savings bonds to 3¾ percent and on long-term marketable securities to 4¾ percent. Both increases are urgently required for the Government to maintain effective borrowing power in the face of intensified competition for investment dollars.

Series E and H savings bond sales declined 10 percent in the first 8 months of 1959 compared with the corresponding period last year. At the same time there was a 13 percent increase in savings bond redemptions. A higher interest rate is needed to stimulate savings bond sales and encourage owners of bonds to hold them.

In the case of long-term Treasury securities, there simply is no market for them at 4¼ percent when many other high grade bonds are available that offer a higher return. The Government is forced to issue short-term notes that are costly and inflationary.

A higher interest rate on long-term Treasury securities would save the taxpayers money and put the Government on a sounder financial basis.

[From Life magazine]

HOW BOND RATES AFFECT YOU

Nobody in his right mind thinks that Congress would ever imperil the national defense by refusing to pay the Pentagon's bills. And if it did so there would be such an outburst of indignation that Congress would get cracking.

But the reverse of this is happening. The management of the public debt is also of vital concern. Yet Congress is refusing to give the Treasury the powers it needs to manage the public debt in a sound and orderly way. There has been no outburst of public indignation because the issue is difficult for laymen to grasp.

They had better grasp it, for it effects the value of their savings and the security of their future. By its failure to act, Congress is driving up interest rates and adding to inflationary pressures. Here are the simple facts:

The dead hand of the past—a World War I measure passed in 1918—puts a ceiling of 4¼ percent on long-time Government bonds and savings bonds. It is these bonds, bought by insurance companies, trust funds and the savings of individuals, which should carry as much as possible of the public debt because they check inflation by taking savings out of the scramble for goods.

This 41-year-old ceiling on bond interest makes it increasingly harder for the Treasury to sell new bonds. Institutions and individuals, since they can get better rates from other securities, refuse to buy them. Since 1946, for example, life insurance companies have reduced their holdings of Government bonds from 45 percent of their assets to a mere 7 percent. Many individuals cash in their savings bonds.

Instead of putting out long-term bonds with interest rates high enough to make them marketable, the Treasury has been forced to raise the needed money by short-term paper (e.g., 91-day notes), which are bought chiefly by commercial banks. Since they are virtually the same thing as cash, these notes can be used by the banks to expand their loans. They can lend $5 of new money for each $1 of Treasury notes they own. This has an immediate inflationary effect.

Furthermore, this "monetizing" of the debt tends to drive up interest rates as the Government competes with other borrowers for scarce money. In the last fortnight, for example, the rate on 91-day notes has just risen to 3.8 percent, the highest level since the bank crisis of 1933. If this trend continues, even short-term interest rates may soon exceed the 4¼-percent ceiling on long-term bonds. This freakish result is made more likely by Speaker RAYBURN'S announcement last week that Congress won't act this year on the President's reiterated request for lifting the interest ceiling. Such inaction undermines the dollar by raising doubts abroad as to its soundness and damages the Government's credit, just as it does the economy itself.

Some leaders are urging the President, on his return, to take the issue to the voters as he did on labor reform. If Congress adjourns without action, the President may call it back in special session. But voters themselves can help speed the necessary action by letting their Congressmen know that they back the President. He has stated the issue very clearly:

"The vital interests of all Americans are at stake because excessive reliance on short-term financing can have grave consequences for the purchasing power of the dollar. * * * Let me state as plainly as I can that this is not legislation to increase interest rates. * * * We always seek to borrow as cheaply as we can. To prohibit the Treasury from paying the market price for long-term money is just as impracticable as telling the Defense Department that it cannot pay the fair market price for a piece of equipment. The result would be the same in either case: the Government could not get what it needs."

PRICE OF PROSPERITY IS HIGH MONEY RATE

(By J. A. Livingston)

Prosperity—and that's what we are having despite the prolonged steel strike—can only be had at a price.

We—you and I and everyone else—are paying for record personal income, high employment, and a construction boom, in the higher price of money. Interest rates have gone up again.

This isn't going to please some Congressmen who favor plenty of credit at a low price. And most emphatically it doesn't please Wall Street. Stock prices sold off within 5 minutes after the First National City Bank of New York announced that the prime rate would be 5 percent instead of 4½ percent. Other banks across the Nation followed.

The prime rate is the price of money to banks' biggest and best customers, customers such as Sears, Roebuck, General Motors, Continental Can, and so on. Yet, when the prime rate notches up, the rates charged smaller businessmen go up. The costs of financing homes, automobiles, trips to Europe rise, too. States, cities, towns and school and water districts also have to pay more when they borrow.

BONDS VERSUS STOCKS

Immediately bonds went down in price, and that's why Wall Street "spazzed." Many U.S. Treasury securities sold at all-time lows. Government issues can now be bought to yield better than 4½ percent. Many tax-exempt municipal bonds yield 4½ and 5 percent. Excellent corporate bonds yield 5 percent plus. This puts pressure on stocks.

Numerous high-grade industrial stocks yield only about 3 percent. But the lure of higher dividends to come and the fear of inflation have persuaded most investors to accept the lower return. But how long can this go on? That's what canny Wall Streeters wonder.

A higher price for money was an inevitable consequence of prosperity. The Nation's banks are "loaned up." Their customers are borrowing $12 billion more than a year ago. To meet this demand, commercial banks have sold $3 billion in Government bonds. Also, they, themselves, are borrowing about $1 billion from the Federal Reserve System, some $800 million more than a year ago.

THE INFLATION ILLUSION

The jump in interest rates reemphasizes the deep schism in Washington. President Eisenhower, Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, and Federal Reserve Board Chairman Martin argue that easy money leads to inflation. In the period since 1955, we've had a 13-percent rise in per capital personal income. But only 30 percent of the advance was real. Seventy percent was the result of higher prices.

The Reserve has supported Secretary Anderson's request to Congress for elimination of the 3.26 percent ceiling on savings bonds and the 4¼ percent ceiling on long-term marketable Government bonds.

Many Democratic Congressmen reject this thesis. They say credit restraint fosters inflation by curbing production. If we had more goods, prices wouldn't advance.

POLITICAL ISSUE IN 1960?

Anderson has been unable to get the Democratic Congress to eliminate the 4¼-percent interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds. However, the 3.26 percent ceiling on E- and H-bonds is likely to be raised to 3¾ percent in a last-minute push.

This monetary issue will persist long after the steel strike is settled. It could become a major campaign issue in 1960—a repeat of the Bryan-McKinley cross-of-gold contests of 1896 and 1900.

What Congressmen, in all political honesty, are groping for is an answer to this question: How do you raise the standard of living of everyone efficiently and satisfactorily?

President Eisenhower answers: Through a balanced budget and restraint on the money supply. If the money supply is restricted, then businessmen and labor unions won't be able to make price-boosting wage agreements.

APOLOGIA FOR MONEY RESTRAINT

Prof. Sidney Weintraub, in his recent book, "A General Theory of the Price Level, Output, Income Distribution, and Economic Growth," expressed the countervailing argument. He says prices depend not on the money supply but on the level of wages.

Therefore, he would suggest that before companies in basic industries, such as steel, autos, rubber, aluminum, etc., raise wages and prices, they should first publish their plans. This would subject their decisions to public reaction, probably to public hearings. The argument against this proposal is that ultimately it would force the Government to intervene directly.

Hence, the administration leans toward indirect restraint, even though—as the postwar record shows—it hasn't stopped inflation. Defenders of monetary policy apologize for its poor performance by saying: "A continually unbalanced budget is bound to have an inflationary impact on prices." I am one of these apologists.

[From Time, Sept. 7, 1959]

MONEY: TOWARD A CRISIS

Congress' refusal to act on the administration's debt-management program last week continued to disrupt the market for Government and corporate securities. Even as President Eisenhower drafted a special message urging Congress to lift the 4¼ percent interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds, the Treasury announced that it had to pay 3.824 percent interest on short-term (91-day) bills, the highest since the bank holiday of March 1933.

The effects of the Treasury's reliance on short-term borrowing in the midst of an overall tightening of the money supply (Time, Aug. 31) were readily apparent. By drawing $1.6 billion in new cash during the last month, Treasury financing—despite Federal Reserve Board buying support—boosted the rate on 26-week Treasury bills to a record 4.15 percent. The yield on most long-term Government bonds was more than 4 percent for the first time since the 1930's, and some yields rose as high as 4.8 percent. Corporate bond yields also rose; unable to sell their public-utility offerings at the issued price, three Manhattan underwriting syndicates broke up.

Unless Congress acts, the troubles of the Treasury and the money market will worsen in October and November. Then, to raise about $7 billion to finance the seasonal deficit and another $8.9 billion to meet debt coming due, the Treasury will have to go to market with more short-term issues.

CRIME IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Crime in the Capital—An Intimate Message From Washington," written by Josephine Ripley, which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor for September 4, 1959.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRIME IN THE CAPITAL—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Josephine Ripley)

While President Eisenhower dedicates himself to the prevention of violence in world affairs, and Congress votes defense billions as a war deterrent, a high tide of crime is surging through the streets of the Nation's capital.

Congress has been investigating it. The police department is throwing its limited force into the battle against it.

The crime wave has been on the increase for the past 3 years. The strength of the police force has not. Only recently has this dangerous situation reached headline proportions, in purse snatchings and attacks which have involved prominent women and Members of Congress.

Capital residents can take no comfort from the fact that while major crimes have increased from 15,793 in 1957 to 17,865 in fiscal 1959, the authorized strength of the police force—2,508—is the same today as it was 2 years ago.

In 1957 it was found impossible to recruit even that many policemen because the salary was too low to be attractive. Salaries have been increased since then and the force today is at full strength—minus a few on military leave.

Congress, which holds the purse strings, is at last considering making more money available for a bigger police force. Hearings have been held before the Senate Appropriations Committee. There is some evidence that the police department, with an assist from lawbreakers who have been picking prominent victims, has made a persuasive case for more funds.

Among victims of attacks in recent months, mostly purse snatchings, have been Mrs. Donald Quarles, wife of the former Deputy Secretary of Defense; the wife of a prominent newspaperman, Mrs. Edgar Ansel Mowrer; a Senator's wife (unnamed); Representative CHARLES DIGGS, JR., Democrat, of Michigan, threatened with attack by a young knife-bearing gangster when he tried to go to the rescue of a man being kicked and beaten by the ruffians; Representative FRANK THOMPSON, Democrat, of New Jersey, who was squirted with acid by a passenger in a small truck as he was driving to the Capitol in the morning.

Within the past month a young Army officer was shot when he tried to scare away a gang tampering with his car. A newspaperwoman who lives near the Capitol was the subject of threatening letters delivered surreptitiously to her home.

Many of these crimes or attempted crimes are by juveniles—a fact pointing up the shortage of juvenile court judges in the District. Congress has authorized only one, and this one has been so swamped with cases that trials are delayed for months while the delinquent often roams the streets committing new offenses before being brought to account for the original one.

A bill to provide two additional judges for juvenile courts is now under consideration. Attorney General Rogers has promised that if approval is given to this request, one will be chosen from each political party.

The police department is particularly handicapped because crime is no longer concentrated in certain areas. Gangs circulate in almost all neighborhoods, including high-class residential areas. Nor do they confine their activities to dark or remote sections.

One woman was set upon on a well-lighted street near one of the city's large hotels and in the company of two women friends. Mrs. Quarles was waiting for her car on a well-lighted corner when she was knocked down by a pickpocket.

The police department is supplied with a list of the precincts in which these incidents occur. Out of the city's 14 precincts, "from 9 to 11 are on almost every list," according to an officer in the department.

Men are promptly deployed to these areas and roving patrols are stepped up, along with additional men on street patrol.

The Juvenile Bureau of the Youth Aid Division of the department sends a special patrol to question juveniles found loitering in areas where robberies have occurred, to find out if they live nearby, and if not why they are hanging around.

Police Chief Robert V. Murray and District Commissioner Robert E. McLaughlin are now considering the possibility of using trained dogs on police patrol. "The recent sharp rise in muggings and other street assaults has lent urgency to the need for a decision in using dogs," according to the Commissioner.

Dogs are being used effectively in a number of cities, including nearby Baltimore, where they accompany officers on night patrol.

Meanwhile many women venture with caution on the street at night, and keep their car doors locked if driving. Public agitation is making itself felt in new pressure on Congress for funds to protect the Nation's Capital from this shocking invasion of violence and crime.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, we have heard a good deal about some of the well-known persons who have been subjects of muggings, thefts, and other crimes, such as Mrs. Donald Quarles, wife of the former Deputy Secretary of Defense, the wife of a prominent newspaperman, Mrs. Edgar Ansel Mowrer, Representative CHARLES C. DIGGS, JR., a Member of the other body, the acid throwing on Representative FRANK THOMPSON, and other events; but I daresay there are a lot of unreported incidents in the Capital which never reach the pages of newspapers.

I should like to express the hope that before this session is completed, the other body will pass a bill adding at least one of the two needed additional juvenile court judges necessary to cope with these depredations in the Capital City.

I think this Capital is extremely fortunate in having the kind of efficient police force it has because it is one of the best in the country. In my opinion, and I am sure I am joined by all my colleagues as well as the people of Washington, the head of the police department, Chief Robert Murray, is one of the best police chiefs in the country, as well.

Again, I express the hope that not only will the Appropriations Committee, which I understand will consider various appropriation bills today, provide for the addition of at least 100 policemen to the District of Columbia police force at the present time—I really wish it could be 250—and that next year it would see to it that a 500-man increase is included in the budget, and that, at the same time—I repeat—in the other body there is provided at least one of the two additional juvenile court judges needed to take care of a situation which is rampant in the Capital at the present time. The need for these judges is now if we are to cope with a dangerous and growing situation.

THE STEEL STRIKE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as the days go by and there appears to be no indication of a settlement of the steel strike, I am exceedingly concerned about not only the effect upon the national economy, which is very grave and serious indeed, but about the effect on unemployment in my own State, where so many thousands of men have been put out of work because of the strike, and where additional thousands have lost their jobs in subsidiary industries by reason of the fact that those industries cannot get the steel which is needed to continue operations.

I am particularly concerned that there appears to be no break in the negotiations, and I am beginning to wonder to what extent the position of the negotiators on behalf of the steel companies is a proper position and an adequate one.

There appeared in the August 20 issue of the Reporter magazine an article entitled "Roger Blough's Crusade," written by Paul Jacobs, a competent and reputable reporter. I ask unanimous consent that the article may appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROGER BLOUGH'S CRUSADE

(By Paul Jacobs)

This is in many ways a very odd strike. The steel negotiations have differed from the pattern of recent years on points both great and small.

For the first time in many years, the negotiations have literally been taking place—at the steel companies' request—across a table. Hitherto, company and union representatives ranged themselves casually about a room, talking from comfortable armchairs.

Also for the first time, two of the company negotiators have been taking detailed notes of what is said—thereby ensuring that nothing candid or unofficial may be said.

There have been—again by the companies' choice—no informal contacts of any kind between the two camps: no breakfasts, no cocktails, no corridor conversations.

The steel companies have confronted the union with a set of negotiators consisting of three lawyers and an industrial engineer, R. Conrad Cooper, who is chairman of the negotiating committee. In contrast to some of their predecessors, who had been operating heads of steel plants, these men are front-office administrative personnel.

The steel companies have let it become known that before the contracts expired in June and even before negotiations had begun, they had leased office space in the Chrysler East Building for their negotiating team and its staff—the lease to run until October 15.

Only a few months ago, there was no reason to anticipate such oddities as these. What seemed to be in the offing was a routine set of complicated negotiations, interrupted by a routine strike during which the companies would use up their inventory and the workers their vacation pay and some unemployment-insurance benefits, and ending with a modest wage increase to be followed by a small rise in steel prices. Hardly anyone took very seriously the florid pre-crisis rhetoric of either side, and speculation centered on the duration of the inevitable strike and the size of the inevitable wage-price settlement. The brokerage firm of Goldman, Sachs advised its clients: "We recommend purchase of the better steel equities at this time. A steel strike when labor contracts expire on June 30, appears very possible. If more than normal wage increases are granted, we would expect compensating price increases."

What made the prognosis even more hopeful were some well-known facts. First, the steelworkers, with vivid memories of the recent recession, were in anything but a militant mood; and while the union leaders were insisting on a wage increase, it was widely reported that they would settle for a cluster of fringe benefits. Second, public opinion was nervous over the issue of inflation, and the steel companies were in a position to sweep the ground away from under the union simply by announcing a token lowering of some of their prices—a step that their record profits would have made relatively painless. It was precisely because the union leadership was so alarmed at this possibility that it took such a dim—and unimaginative—view of those friendly liberal economists who were urging it openly to forego a wage claim in return for a cut in steel prices: it thought the companies might be only too happy to make a gesture in this direction, a gesture that public opinion would accept for the reality.

But the steel companies seemed to have new ideas of their own. New and yet old.

THE HIGH CHARGE OF THE OLD GUARD

The principal spokesman for these ideas is Roger M. Blough, a lawyer, who was elected in 1955 as board chairman of United States Steel. Blough is a smalltown boy who was a high school principal before becoming a corporation lawyer. Though he didn't come up from rags, as Steel's publicity people try to suggest, he has certainly risen to riches.

Unlike Myron Taylor and Ben Fairless before him, who were on friendly terms with the union leaders and who believed in good labor relations, Blough is aloof and hard, with a distinct sense of mission. This mission, as he sees it, is to free American industry from its bondage to the trade unions, to restore to capitalist enterprise its ineluctable prerogatives, and to disabuse Government of any notion that it ought to meddle in economic and industrial problems. This "new" line is, of course, really an old one. In fact, what Blough has done is to offer vigorous leadership to the Old Guard of American industry—the Taft-Knowland enthusiasts who think President Eisenhower is "soft" on liberalism. One of his allies in his current campaign is Charles White of Republic Steel, an old supporter of professional hate salesman and rabid antiunionist Joseph Kamp. For a long time it was assumed that an industrialist like White was a relic of an earlier period, soon to be extinct. But the rise to top executive power of corporation lawyers like Blough—men with strong, preconceived ideas, with no firsthand knowledge of the steelworkers' community and the role of the union in it—has breathed new life into the species.

To be sure, they are not having everything entirely their own way. Within the steel industry itself there are many—momentarily silenced—who think Blough is riding for a fall. Thus, Iron Age, the industry's magazine, has editorialized against his approach, warning that this kind of toughness could only result in eventual Government intervention.

The aluminum industry, whose wage policies are traditionally patterned after those of steel, has refused to join steel in its all-out fight and, in extending its present contract with the union, has agreed to make any wage increase retroactive. (A similar offer by the steel union, which might have averted the present strike, had been turned down flatly by Blough.) It is no secret that the Mellon group in Pittsburgh has many doubts about the new-old look in labor relations. General Lucius Clay of American Can, which had cut its prices on the basis of an assumption that steel was going to do likewise, is said to be more than a little annoyed.

RED-HOT IRON

Nevertheless, Blough is in charge. It is he who has set the tone for the full-page newspaper ads featuring a Russian worker with the caption "Will he take away our American steel worker's job?" (It is characteristic of Dave McDonald's leadership of the Steelworkers that the union's ads in reply almost always featured a photograph of—Dave McDonald.)

Early in the negotiations, the companies proposed the simple abolition of the cost-of-living clause in the previous contract, by which wages were protected against inflation. The union people could scarcely believe their ears. How could they possibly go back to their membership with what was in effect a wage cut, at a time when steel profits were sky-high?

In addition, the company later demanded that eight changes—affecting such things as working conditions, vacations, and supplementary benefits—be made in the contract as a precondition for any possible wage increase, no matter how small. Even the companies now admit that this was a serious tactical error. Some featherbedding doubtless exists, but it has never been considered a serious problem in the steel industry. If anything, the contrary is the case: rising productivity and the ensuing technological unemployment are a real headache for the union. Moreover, while the highly paid steelworkers do not have much heart in striking for more money, they take very seriously indeed any attempt to encroach on their hardwon privileges within the plant. A man will far more readily fight to the bitter end for his right to go to the toilet without first getting a supervisor's permission than he will for eight cents an hour. Every plant manager knows that; every shop steward knows it; it is precisely over such matters that the majority of "unofficial" strikes take place.

The net effect of all this was to convert a reluctant strike into a solid one. The steelworkers now feel that their union itself is in danger; and they are rallying behind it. The opposition to McDonald within the union (he is not the most popular of leaders) has been crushed in the stampede to close ranks.

But it is possible that Roger Blough does not see things in this light. His is a very private vision. One of the lawyer-negotiators for the industry, John Morse, has said that the companies have no plans to try to reopen the mills "unless the strikes goes on for a very long time and there is a revolt among the membership." It is exactly the sort of statement to alarm and infuriate every union leader in America. For steel is a pacesetter; and if management can actually conceive of breaking an official, industry-wide strike—which means breaking the steel union—then so can other companies. There can be little doubt that if the the steel industry tries to operate its mills during the strike, labor relations in America will take a long step back toward the tooth-and-claw pattern of an earlier period.

In the meantime, the White House is maintaining a hands-off policy, to the exasperation of Secretary of Labor Mitchell and to the bafflement of just about everyone else. It is hard to believe that President Eisenhower is genuinely intimidated by Blough's threat that if there is any settlement as a result of Government intervention he may push through a price increase regardless of the consequences. More likely, the President is sufficiently impressed by Blough's posture as the leader of a campaign against inflation to give him a relatively free rein.

And yet, for a variety of reasons, the Government may finally be forced to intervene. If the strike continues much longer, the loss to the Government in revenue—from corporate taxes, individual income taxes, and tax refunds—may be such as to produce a sizable budget deficit in 1960. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON has already asked Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson for an estimate of such revenue losses.

Next year is an election year—for the Republican Party if not for President Eisenhower. And it is impossible to imagine that the Republican leadership wants to campaign on a record of having stood idly by while the worst economic disruption of two decades broke out in the midst of a prosperous America.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have no way of knowing whether Mr. Jacobs' review of the situation is correct, but if it is correct, even in part, I suggest it is high time that the top executives of the steel corporations sat down with the leaders of the United Steel Workers of America to work out a sensible solution of this problem, instead of trying to turn the clock back and leaving their representation to lawyers who have never had the slightest personal experience in the operation of steel mills.

Mr. CLARK subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the morning hour I spoke briefly on the subject of the steel strike and its effect in my Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

At this point I ask unanimous consent that two memorandums, one on the effect of the work stoppage in the steel industry, and the other on steel work stoppage halting unemployment decline, may appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my earlier remarks.

There being no objection, the press releases were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The effects of the work stoppage in the steel industry on employment in Pennsylvania are being surveyed weekly by the Bureau of Employment Security and reports made to Gov. David L. Lawrence at regular intervals according to William L. Batt, Jr., secretary of labor and industry. The following is the most recent report prepared as of September 1, 1959:

10	Stroudsburg	Pike, Monroe, Carbon, Schuylkill, Luzerne (southern portion).

Both continued and initial claims for unemployment compensation filed in Pennsylvania during the week ending August 28 decreased from the previous week's totals according to William L. Batt, Jr., secretary of labor and industry. Continued claims dropped from 166,814 for the week ending August 21 to 165,718 for the week ending August 28. This week's total includes 19,515 continued claims filed during the week by workers indirectly idled as a result of the current work stoppage in the steel industry. However, the increase in the number of such claims (1,400) over 1 week ago did not offset decreases from other sources. Fewer layoffs in construction, better work schedules in some segments of the apparel and textile industries plus claimants exhausting their benefit rights accounted for the major portion of the decline.

Initial claims (new unemployment) dropped from 22,899 to 22,570 during the week ending August 28. Batt stated that this week's total includes 2,533 initial claims filed by workers indirectly idled as a result of the work stoppage in the steel industry bringing the cumulative total of such claims to 25,366 since the start of the current work stoppage. The current decline resulted from fewer initial claims from primary and fabricated metals, bituminous mining, construction, food processing, transportation equipment, and chemicals. Partially offsetting these decreases were sizable increases from apparel, textiles, nonelectrical machinery, and anthracite mining.

During the week 150,521 unemployment compensation checks amounting to $4,205,003 were issued to regular unemployment compensation claimants.

STEEL WORK STOPPAGE HALTS UNEMPLOYMENT DECLINE

The 6-month decline in unemployment in Pennsylvania was halted in August as a result of the work stoppage in the steel industry, William L. Batt, Jr., secretary of labor and industry, announced today.

Estimated total unemployment increased 4,000 between mid-July and mid-August. This brought the total number of idled workers up to 385,000, or 7.7 percent of the total civilian labor force. In mid-July the rate of unemployment was 7.6 percent in Pennsylvania, in comparison with 5.2 percent for the Nation. United States figures for August are not yet available.

Although the 168,000 steelworkers directly involved in the steel work stoppage are not counted as part of the unemployed, workers laid off in allied industries as an indirect effect of the work stoppage are included. Such secondary unemployment amounted to approximately 39,000 in mid-August, and was concentrated principally in the mining, railroad, construction, and manufacturing industries. The manufacturing industries chiefly affected were those producing metals and metal products and stone, clay, and glass products.

Batt observed that the rise in unemployment between July and August was contraseasonal. In addition, he indicated that, were it not for the steel work stoppage, a further substantial seasonal decline in unemployment would have occurred.

The August unemployment total was still 92,000 above the prerecession level of 266,000 in August 1957 when 5.6 percent of the civilian labor force was unemployed. However, the current level is 121,000 below that of August of last year when, as a result of the recession, 479,000 workers were unemployed, representing 10.2 percent of the total civilian labor force.

THE NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE: SOLVING RACIAL PROBLEMS THROUGH UNDERSTANDING

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, as the National Urban League holds its 1959 annual conference here in Washington, it can look back with justifiable pride on nearly 50 years of efforts to solve the complex problems of race relations. In the area of "social progress," as the league terms it, this unique organization, through the wisdom, courage, and dogged determination of its leaders, has made great strides.

With remarkable patience and insight, the league has worked all across America to promote better understanding and cooperation among all our people. Its members have most ably promoted the Urban League's slogan that "American teamwork works."

At a time when relations between the races are not what we would like them to be, and at a time when racial tensions are high in some areas, the program of the Urban League is vital and necessary. The league deserves the cooperation of all men of good will as it works toward its goal of insuring that every American is given the chance to develop and contribute his talents to the good of his community and his Nation.

Mr. President, two of the significant addresses made at the 1959 annual conference of the National Urban League have come to my attention. One was delivered by Dr. Lester A. Granger, executive director of the league and a long-time distinguished leader in its work. Another address was by Julius A. Thomas, the league's director of industrial relations. I ask unanimous consent to have both speeches printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABSTRACT OF SPEECH BY DR. GRANGER

Race in American life has been repeatedly and badly mangled in its handling as an issue during the past 100 years. The wonder is not so much that a racial problem still remains today in dangerous proportions as that so much impressive progress has been made during the past half century in the face of bungling and cynical exploitation of the issue of race.

Ever since the opening of the Civil War the race problem has been used by unscrupulous elements cleverly to advance their own interests, whether they be financial or political, or merely the release of neurotic and psychotic impulses.

In this category fall the reconstruction period and Ku Klux Klan; the establishment of a color bar when the American labor movement was first organized; continued racial discrimination by rank and file labor groups even today; the notorious draft riots that swept New York City during the Civil War, and caused the symbolical lynching of Negroes; the tolerated continuance of lynching up to recent years; the iron-band imposition of racial discrimination in employment and the passage of jim-crow laws in a third of the States of the country, striking heavily at the dignity, the security and the right to self-expression of a majority of the Negro population.

Such practices and policies were carried on during the second-half of the 19th century to such a degree that the average observer would have been forgiven for relinquishing hope during the early years of the 20th century of ever seeing any appreciable dent being made in the size and shape of the American race problem.

That this is no longer true as we stand on the threshold of the Urban League's golden 50th anniversary in 1960 is due in large measure to the wisdom, courage, and determination shown by the men and women who founded our movement. For they demonstrated what was for that time a remarkable clearsighted understanding of the complexities of the American race problem.

At the same time they evidence a devoted faith in a basically simple method applied to the problem's eventual solution, namely, tying the interests of the racial minority into the overall interest of the community to the end that Americans of different races would increasingly learn to understand and trust each other, and by working together solve the problems of not only the minority but of the total community-at-large.

The fact that a problem is complicated as the race problem is complicated does not necessarily mean that efforts to solve it must be complicated to the point of tangled confusion. One of the reasons why such rapid progress in the field of racial problems has been made during the past quarter century is that a clear distinction has been made between the judicial and legislative struggle, on the one hand, and the effort to develop social progress on the other.

It is this latter effort which the league accepted as its responsibility, and which the league almost alone among American organizations has carried forward for 50 years. Not always, it is true, with clear public understanding of the special nature of the league's importance or the special accomplishments which the league has recorded over the years.

Only recently, as the legal fight has proven not to be so quickly and easily won, as was once thought possible, have colored and white Americans begun to realize that a struggle for the social, economic and political emancipation of a racial minority can no more be achieved through one method alone than a wide-ranging battle can be won solely by the sudden thrust of a regiment of tanks. A one-front battle effort can be quickly isolated, and its leadership destroyed; a one-front drive for equality of opportunity in American life would be defeated before it should be started.

Nineteen-sixty, therefore, as our golden 50th anniversary, comes during a period of near-miraculous timeliness. We are in the midst of a strong sweep of social change in every area of racial relationships.

We have an opportunity, therefore, during our year-long observance of our 50th anniversary as an interracial movement professional in our nature and democratic in our objectives, not only to evaluate our past record but also to analyze the needs revealed in current changes and to plan our next 5 to 10 years on the basis of today's new needs.

We must find a way clearly to tell our message to the American people, for once the people listen no matter what their race or political affiliation—so long as they have a belief in the democratic way of life—they must see the vital role played by the Urban League movement in American community affairs today.

For instance, tomorrow's scientists and technicians, that league-sponsored program aimed at providing Negro youth with incentives for success, becomes not merely an effort to encourage training today for tomorrow's job, but also a powerful contribution toward a stable generation of Negro youth for today and tomorrow.

Our program in housing is concerned today with problems of slum clearance, tenant relocation and urban renewal. But this includes the interim protection of tens of thousands of Negro families displaced by slum clearance. More, it means a more orderly planning today for the elimination of racial ghettoes tomorrow.

Our program of industrial relations constitutes an effort to raise the job level of 7 million Negro workers. But this means, also, raising the income level of 5 million Negro families. And all of this adds up to abolition of the race label on poverty, social disorganization, crime, and disease. It means a better America and this Americans must see.

Our interracial planning actively carried on by 3,000 white and colored American leaders throughout the country constitutes the substitution of authenticated face for irrational passion. It offers promise of solid future growth in stable racial relationships, instead of temporary amelioration of racial tension arrived at through opportunistic concessions and temporary appeasement.

When the American public, with our help, understands more widely that this is what the Urban League stands for, then that public will understand why the Urban League slogan is "American teamwork works."

STATEMENT OF JULIUS A. THOMAS, DIRECTOR OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE

About 16 years ago it was my privilege to join the staff of the National Urban League. My position was designated as director of industrial relations. I must admit that I was scared half to death as I contemplated the size of the job we were endeavoring to do.

This position in the national office was comparatively new, although the Urban League had long been identified with the employment problems of Negro workers. Well do I remember the employment offices to be found in most local league offices around the country. It isn't always realized that the Urban League was the first community service agency to provide a "free employment service" such as we conducted in those early days.

As we discussed the objectives of league movement during the first few months I was in the national office, it seemed clear that our program needed something new. This was during the early days of the war. The demand for labor had all but dried up the so-called labor reserves. President Roosevelt had issued Executive Order 8802 and the flow of labor was regulated by the War Manpower Commission.

After considerable discussion with staff and board members it was generally agreed that we should endeavor to do several things that were not ordinarily done by social work agencies. Among these let me mention a few.

1. It was recognized that by and large many important industrial and business concerns knew little or nothing about the Urban League except that it was considered a "respectable group of nice people." To a certain extent this usage of Urban League was shared by a substantial segment of the labor movement. We decided, therefore, that we had to tell our story to an increasing number of management and labor leaders.

2. It was realized also that we needed to find a medium through which we could extend our areas of influence with the help of interested labor and business leadership.

Essential in the approach to a revamped industrial relations program is manpower, which I am sure you realize. We called together one or two longstanding friends and a half dozen new friends to help us crystallize our thinking. The Management Advisory Council, organized in 1945, was one of the first steps. The Trade Union Adivsory Council, formed several months later, was the second.

"In what way can an organization like the Urban League make a solid impact on employment and labor union practices?" was the question we put to these committees. The replies were varied as you might suspect but one central point was echoed again and again. It was this: You must get to know the appropriate officials in industry and labor and you must find ways of influencing their thinking as well as their behavior as it relates to our program.

This was no simple job although there was more interest in the Negro worker than we had known before World War II. One by one we approached top people in some of our industrial giants. Much to our surprise we found most of them receptive to our representations. Our management advisory committee, headed by Winthrop Rockefeller, began to recognize the soundness of our operation. Soon we were able to add other leaders of industry. Our trade union committee, led by Tom Young, began to show evidence of vigor and we were able to expand its membership.

Much of this is well known to most of you and I will not attempt to detail the action inspired by this combination of industry, labor and Urban League teamwork. I do, however, wish to note that we incorporated other new approaches in our relationship with Government agencies. The plan of operation with the Government Employment Service was one byproduct of our many discussions with Government officials.

We also sharpened our guidance and placement program. Career conferences were proposed to colleges and high schools. The pilot placement program was successfully carried on. In these and other ways we earned an enviable place in the esteem of many persons and organizations that know of us only as "a place to get a job."

We face today a new era in Urban League industrial relations and vocational services. This new era stems from many recent developments affecting labor integration. First, I think, is the enactment of fair employment practice laws and ordinances in 18 States and 42 cities. Almost 100 million Americans live in these States and cities.

The Federal Government, through Executive and administrative orders, has taken positive action to reduce employment discrimination based on race and religion. The normal expansion in the population and the labor force—4 million more people and 800,000 more workers—have vastly increased the number and variety of jobs to be done by all American workers. And I can name other influences that have altered the context in which we work.

Against this background what should be the new role of the league's industrial relations and vocational services program? Carlton Yeldell will discuss the implications of our programing with organized labor. Bill Douthit will project our role vis-a-vis Government agencies.

Briefly, I want to talk about the things we can do more of with industrial and business management.

First, let's look at our assets:

1. We have a larger and better trained staff of professional personnel than we ever have had.

2. There is growing recognition, if not universal public understanding and approval, of what we have been endeavoring to do for the past 48 years.

3. We have supporting allies in a strong commerce and industry council and an active trade union council at the National League and comparable groups at many local leagues.

How then do we get the best average and mileage out of these resources? Again speaking primarily of our management relationship, let me venture these observations.

The corporations (29) representing the membership of our National Commerce and Industry Council employ almost 4 million workers and include almost every major industry and business field in our economy. I have often wondered what would happen if we concentrated a major part of our effort on just these 29 corporations. In addition, we can name 60 important national enterprises whose managements know us and are willing to work with us on many of our industrial relations problems and projects. Altogether we are in a position to influence the performance of nearly 100 national enterprises in the matter of Negro employment.

The next question, it seems to me, is how do we take full advantage of these relationships?

I shall not attempt to answer this question fully. I strongly urge you, however, to study carefully the speech to be heard Thursday morning when Al Watters of General Foods addresses the conference.

I do wish to point out a few things that seem to me important for further discussion.

First of all, I do not think we have organized effective followup of our national contacts in our industrial relations programing.

This is not a critical observation. The cold fact is we just do not have sufficient manpower either in the national office or in most local leagues to do the job we are all capable of doing. But a major part of our shortcomings in this regard is a result of inadequate communications—a subject we have discussed and will discuss many times during this conference.

Specifically, we in the national office have not given you a complete report on what we have done and are doing to enlist the participation of these corporations in the league's program. And, I might add, we in the national office do not get as much information from local affiliates regarding the performance of the hundreds of local units of these corporations.

An official of one of our council corporations said to me a few days ago "most of the hiring takes place where the work is being done in the local plant. After you have convinced us there still remains the job of bringing along the local plant management. We'll do our part, but we can use your help."

And this is the attitude we encounter in the majority of multiplant corporations when we discuss our program.

These remarks have extended far beyond my plan and I have just begun to give you what I believe to be the future role of the Urban League in the field of industrial relations. For example, I have not mentioned another item that always pops up when we work at this. I am referring to management procedures in corporations.

Almost every corporation has its own methods of dealing with mangement problems. So a corporation executive, once he has decided to go along with our program, proceeds to tell us how to get things done in his corporation, how not to make mistakes that will hamstring our program. These are the nuances of our job—but they are important.

Finally, let me say I believe we have come of age in the projection of our goals to a significant segment of industrial and business leadership. I hope, therefore, that this conference and the months ahead will afford an opportunity to assess our progress to date and to move forward with a full head of steam towards the realization of our goal:

To every man a chance, his God given chance to develop his talents and abilities to the highest possible level and by so doing make secure for himself, his community, and the Nation the heritage of freemen.

TRIBUTE TO THE URBAN LEAGUE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald carries a well-merited editorial tribute to the National Urban League, which today launches its annual conference. The league which has labored so diligently, patiently and successfully in the troubled field of interracial relations, can look back with understandable pride upon its accomplishments.

I wish the league continued success in the days ahead as it carries on with its important and constructive endeavors. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the editorial from the Washington Post and Times Herald.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RACIAL CONCILIATOR

In 60-odd major cities around the country the National Urban League has worked patiently and resourcefully for half a century—through persuasion rather than through litigation—to promote understanding between the white and colored races, to open up economic opportunities for Negroes and to foster full Negro participation in the life of the community. Wherever it has operated, it has rendered useful and healing and constructive service. And it is a pleasure to record that this is particularly true of the Washington Urban League. We extend a warm welcome, therefore, to the 800 delegates asesmbling this morning for the league's 1959 annual conference on the theme, "Community Planning for Equal Opportunity." The beneficent and thoughtful efforts of the Urban League have never been more needed than now. We hope the conference will be a most fruitful one.

RIGHT TO VOTE FOR ELECTORS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary is scheduled to hold hearings on a joint resolution which Senators BEALL, CASE of South Dakota, and I have introduced to permit the residents of the District of Columbia to vote for electors for President and Vice President and for three delegates in the House of Representatives. The purpose of this resolution, in a word, is to extend democracy to Americans who live in the District of Columbia.

Editorials in the Washington Post and Times Herald and the Evening Star in the past several days have enthusiastically endorsed the proposed amendment to the Constitution. These editorial comments, while not surprising, are very heartening and inspiring to those of us interested in this extension of citizenship rights to the residents of the Nation's Capital. I believe these editorials will be of interest to all Members of the Senate, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Sept. 6, 1959]

GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY

The hearings, of necessity, must be brief. Congress is approaching the session's end. There is not much time. But we of Washington should find great satisfaction, and suddenly renewed hope, in the fact that Senate hearings on a proposal to amend the Constitution, permitting residents of this American Capital the right to vote for President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, have been scheduled for next Wednesday, with chances for favorable action.

The list of potential witnesses, ready and willing to testify in favor of this proposition, is a long one. We know of no issue on which there seems to be greater unanimity of opinion. The fundamental but long withheld right of American residents in this city to vote for President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, has won general acceptance. Witnesses could fill volumes with their arguments, to be added to those already in the archives.

But why? What more is there to be said on this subject? Otherwise qualified voters in a city of 850,000—the disqualification being residence in the American Capital—suffer the most wholesale and indefensible discrimination in the whole catalog of denied civil rights. These citizens, these voteless Americans, can be given the right to representation in their Government by a simple amendment of the Constitution that corrects an understandable oversight when it was written. That amendment will not make the District a State. It will not impair, reduce or divide the wise and exclusive control by Congress over its seat of government.

What it does do is to permit residents of this city to vote for President and Vice President, preserving at the same time the concept of the District of Columbia as the Federal City, but permitting its citizens representation in the electoral college they would enjoy if the District was a State; and the right to send three Delegates to the House, with such powers as Congress by legislation may choose to give them.

The brevity of further hearings on that proposition would be a virtue. The need for removing a flagrant contradiction of what we stand for as a nation is self-evident. The resolution for amendment of the Constitution should find a place on the Senate Calendar and receive the favorable action of the Senate at this session.

[From the Washington Evening Star, Sept. 7, 1959]

THE VOTING AMENDMENT

Generally speaking, there have been two forms of constitutional amendment designed to permit residents of Washington to vote for President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

One form is an enabling amendment, merely conferring on Congress the power to prescribe by legislation the degree of representation the District is to have in the electoral college and in Congress.

An example of the other form is the pending Senate Joint Resolution 138, on which Senator KEFAUVER has announced hearings for Wednesday. Introduced by Senator KEATING, of New York, it is a combination of amendments proposed by him, by Senator CASE of South Dakota, and Senator BEALL, of Maryland. It allows three Delegates in the House of Representatives, with such powers (voting or voteless) as Congress may define by legislation, and gives to the District the number of electors for President and Vice President to which the District would be entitled were it a State.

We have always thought the enabling form of amendment the wiser approach, for it permits changes in the degree of representation that experience and population growth might suggest. It has been argued, moreover, that what might seem adequate representation in Congress today, could very well become wholly inadequate in the future and reasonable flexibility is desirable.

But if Congress prefers to spell out the degree of representation in a constitutional amendment, surely the amendment should provide for three Delegates in Congress, with such powers as Congress may define, rather than three Delegates in the House of Representatives, thus closing the door, without further amendment, to any future representation in the Senate.

We would enthusiastically support any form of amendment that can muster the support of two-thirds of House and Senate and three-fourths of the States and permit residents of Washington to vote—for President and Vice President and Representatives in Congress. But we hope the amendment will not foreclose the prospect that the District may one day be represented in the Senate, as well as the House. Hawaii and Alaska, with a combined population less than that of the District, are now represented in the Senate by four Senators; in the House by two Representatives, whose number will increase with the population.

If by constitutional amendment the District would be entitled to three Delegates, with powers later to be defined by Congress, surely the division of these three Delegates as between House and Senate should also be left to Congress.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 8, 1959]

THE FRANCHISE AMENDMENTS

Two of the proposed constitutional amendments that are moving toward a vote in the Senate are almost above controversy. Senator HOLLAND'S resolution, which has the approval of a Judiciary Subcommittee and of enough cosponsors to pass it by the required two-thirds majority, would outlaw poll taxes in the States. Senator KEATING'S resolution to allow residents of the District of Columbia to vote in presidential elections is less favored in the number of its sponsors, but it is so solidly based on democratic principles that any objection to it is difficult to imagine.

Originally Senator KEATING had intended to attach his proposed amendment to the anti-poll-tax measure. We think he was well advised to keep the issues separate to avoid any possible consolidation of opposition. It is highly desirable, moreover, that each proposed change in the Constitution stand on its own merits. Nevertheless, it would be good strategy to advance the two measures at the same time.

Some opposition to the abolition of the poll tax may be heard from the five States which still require such levies. But to the country as a whole taxing the ballot is as obsolete as property qualifications for voting. The country has waited long enough for the five States to bring their own laws into conformity with 20th century democracy.

As for the Keating resolution, the only conceivable argument against it is that it does not give the District full representation in Congress as well as the presidential electoral system, although it does provide for three Delegates in the House and they could be made voting Representatives if Congress should so decide. Even a limited vote for presidential electors, however, would be a long step forward from this community's total disfranchisement, and it should have no adverse effect on home rule. To both of these propositions we respond in the language that Justice Holmes once used to indicate his concurrence in a Supreme Court opinion: "Wee—Mussoo—I float in a fairy bark to the bight and serenely anchor there with you."

SENATOR COOPER FIGHTS WASTE IN OUR DEFENSE EFFORT

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, few men in our Nation today have devoted greater study to or achieved greater understanding of the problems of our Defense Establishment than the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. His vast experience in a broad range of fields and his keen interest in maintaining the military might of our country in the face of the threat of international communism, have led him to make a series of proposals to revamp our defense organization.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] revealed a number of his ideas recently as my guest on a television program, and his comments have drawn interesting editorial comment from all over the country. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial on this subject from the Dallas Morning News of August 26, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROBLEMS OF WASTE IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

In his book "Crusade in Europe," Dwight Eisenhower made a significant statement. He said, "All war is waste." Every attack wastes lives. Every preparation wastes money. The commander's dilemma is to decide whether the results can justify the inevitable waste.

Senator JOHN COOPER, the Kentuckian, appealing to the President personally to stop waste in the Pentagon, is both right and wrong. All preventable waste should be ended. That far he is right. But what often proves to be waste is necessary. That far he is wrong.

The only nation prepared to fight a war is the aggressor which decides whom it is going to attack and when. It can stock the latest arms for that moment. Every nation dedicated to peace but determined to prepare against war is committed to the inevitable waste in stock piling, obsolescence, research.

This is not to say that we cannot save more than we have saved. Schematically, Senator COOPER'S plans for legislation to effect defense economy have appeal. But when you come up to the practical coordination of research for such varied elements as Army, Navy, Air Force, you do not find it so simple. By the way, there is a lot of waste in the Senate, too.

YELLOWTAIL DAM

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following these remarks an editorial entitled "May Get Action Next Year on Yellowtail Dam," which was published in the August 31 issue of the Billings Gazette.

The senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] will remember the author of this editorial, Tom Stout, as a Member of the 63d and 64th Congresses from 1913 to 1917.

Drawing upon his rich experience in Government and newspaper work, Mr. Stout tells how even back in the period when he was serving in Congress, more than 40 years ago, Montana citizens were working for Yellowtail Dam. He mentions, in particular, the work of John Harris, then a resident of Hardin, who made repeated trips to Washington and once took Mr. Stout up to the site of the proposed dam. I mention this bit of history to point up the extreme delay in getting such a needed and worthwhile project underway.

Granted it takes years to draw up the plans and arouse public sentiment in favor of worthwhile resource development projects, but in this instance, almost half a century has elapsed since the time that the benefits of this site were first visualized.

Congress authorized this project 15 years ago. The Congress proposed a settlement with the Crow Indians, for right-of-way payment, which the President unfortunately vetoed. Then the Congress proposed another settlement, to which the President agreed, yet he refused to put any construction money in the budget, and opposes the project just as he opposes other needed new starts.

I remember very well the contributions toward the dam made by John Harris, about whom Mr. Stout writes. Tom Stout himself is too modest to say so, but as a Member of Congress and as a leading editor in our State he, too, has played a major role in the long fight for Yellowtail Dam.

We still have not turned over one spade of dirt as far as actual construction goes. We would have turned over that first spade of dirt several years ago had it not been for the opposition of the present administration to new starts.

I devoutly hope that, as the headline suggests, we will finally get this great project into construction next year.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY GET ACTION NEXT YEAR ON YELLOWTAIL DAM

In an address before the Senate, Monday, August 17, Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, of Montana, expressed disappointment over the failure of a Senate-House conference committee to agree upon appropriation of $3 million for making a start on the construction of Yellowtail Dam in the canyon of the Big Horn River some 40 miles southwest of Hardin in Big Horn County. The Senate Committee on Appropriations included an allocation of the funds in a measure previously approved by public work subcommittee, but when the bill went to a conference committee, the House Members of that committee declined to accept the item which was, therefore, deleted from the bill.

Replying to the statement by Senator MANSFIELD, Senator CARL HAYDEN, of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and also chairman of the subcommittee on public works, explained why it was not considered feasible to make the appropriation at the current session but did say that the funds for starting actual construction of the dam should be made available for the 1960–61 fiscal year.

The cost of this project is fixed at $100 million, but, unless this inflationary spiral is reversed, that cost may rise as time goes on. Also, the history of many of these Government dam projects shows that in all too many instances, the final cost of the undertaking greatly exceeds the estimated cost made at the time the project was authorized. This has something or other to do with the way many of the bureaus of our Federal Government transact business.

It may be assumed that most of the older residents of this section of Montana and some of the later arrivals know the history of the Yellowtail Dam project. Actually, agitation for the construction of this dam was begun not too long after the Reclamation Bureau in the Department of the Interior was established in 1902. There was much to recommend the construction of this dam. First was the advantage which would accrue from the reclamation of several thousand acres of semiarid land. Next was the fact that the site of the structure up there in the Big Horn Canyon was one of the most nearly ideal to be found anywhere in the Western States.

The construction of projects of that kind in States of the West and particularly the Great Plains area, for the irrigation of arid and semiarid lands was the chief reason for the establishment of the Reclamation Bureau under the terms of a measure introduced by Senator Newlands, of Nevada. During his second term, 1905–1911, Senator Thomas H. Carter, of Montana, did much toward establishing that bureau on a firm foundation and for obtaining money for the Lower Yellowstone, Huntley and Sun River projects in Montana.

John Harris, a resident of Hardin until he moved to Chicago in his later years, spent years trying to promote a start on Yellowtail Dam. He made repeated trips to Washington during those years and really kept alive the movement favoring the dam even when success appeared all but hopeless to most of the other backers of the plan.

Harris made some trips to the National Capital while the writer was down there and once, during a vacation period, took us up to the site of the proposed dam. It was then a rugged trip but worth the trouble.

The engineers for the Reclamation Bureau have long recognized the merits of the plan for building a dam up there and have conducted exhaustive surveys and done considerable other preliminary work, but efforts to get started on the project were stymied by an inability to reach an agreement with members of the Crow Indian Council on the damsite and the land to be inundated by the lake created by the dam construction.

While there are some differences between the Federal Government and the Indian council still to be disposed of, there is no longer any substantial hindrance to the start of construction except the lack of an appropriation of funds by the Government and, as Senator HAYDEN has promised our Montana congressional delegation, that will probably be forthcoming after the next session of Congress—at least a sum sufficient to make a good start on the project.

Yellowtail will be a multipurpose dam as are most of those now being constructed by the Federal Government. In addition to making possible the irrigation of a large area of land, it will be equipped with generators to produce a great deal of electric power and serve as an important unit of the upper Missouri River flood control system.

The hundred million or more dollars to be spent for the construction of the dam and the additional sums required to construct an irrigation system and facilities for the generation of electric energy will contribute greatly to the economic progress of this southeastern section of Montana. The progressive little city of Hardin will share with Billings many of the advantages resulting from this project. Members of the Crow Indian Tribe are already assured of a substantial sum of cash for the damsite and land which they will surrender to the Federal Government.

TRIBUTE TO DR. H. TRENDLEY DEAN

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, my colleagues in the Congress who have been interested in the great strides made by American dentistry in recent decades will be interested in knowing that the American Dental Association has announced the retirement of Dr. H. Trendley Dean from the office of secretary of the Association's Council on Dental Research.

At the time of his appointment in 1953 as the first full-time secretary of the Council on Dental Research, Dr. Dean had just completed more than 30 years of outstanding service as a dental officer in the Public Health Service. His retirement from Federal service came after 5 years as the first director of the National Institute of Dental Research.

In his long and distinguished career as an officer in the Public Health Service, scientist, and veteran of two World Wars, Dr. Dean has been the recipient of numerous honors and awards made by many national and international scientific bodies in recognition of his notable contributions in the field of dental research.

Dr. Dean's achievements in the study of fluoridated water and its effect on dental health by themselves would have assured him lasting fame as a research scientist. But of even greater significance was his application of the techniques of epidemiology to the investigation of dental diseases. It is not inconceivable that Dr. Dean's work on the fluorides has resulted in public health measures whose ultimate benefit to mankind in the reduction of dental decay may be comparable only to the effect of vaccination programs on the infectious diseases.

Before speaking further of Dr. Dean's outstanding work as an epidemiologist and public health authority on fluoridation and oral diseases, I would like to go back and review some of the earlier highlights in the life of this dedicated scientist.

Trendley Dean was born before the turn of the century in the small midwestern town of Winstanley Park, long since a part of the city of East St. Louis, Ill. His forebears were among the town's early settlers and their contributions to the history of the community are well-known to longtime residents of the area. In 1916, he received his D.D.S. from St. Louis University. The following year he entered the Dental Corps of the U.S. Army and served in France as a Captain until 1919.

Dr. Dean joined the U.S. Public Health Service 2 years later as an acting assistant dental surgeon. During the next 10 years he served in a variety of Public Health Service posts including the U.S. Marine hospitals in St. Louis, Boston, New York, and San Francisco.

In 1931, Dr. Dean was assigned to the newly renamed National Institute of Health, formerly called the Hygienic Laboratory. As the first dental officer on the scene, he was given the task of establishing a dental hygiene unit. This became the forerunner of the present day National Institute of Dental Research. Dr. Dean headed the dental research program at NIH for the next 17 years. In 1945–46 he was detailed for special duty as colonel with the Army Dental Corps in Europe. Upon the founding of the new Dental Institute by Congress in 1948, he was wisely named as its Director.

Dr. Dean began his work on the problem of fluoridation in his first year at NIH. Investigators studying the relationship between fluorides in drinking water and a dental disease known as mottled enamel had reported that certain areas in the southwestern section of our country had water supplies which contained large amounts of fluoride. They believed this accounted in some way for the high incidence of mottled enamel among the people using those water supplies.

Dr. Dean set out to discover what the relationship was, and if fluorides were responsible for the condition, how much fluoride had to be present before mottling occurred. Working closely with his associates at NIH, Dr. Dean was able to demonstrate conclusively that excessive fluoridation caused the mottling effect. Through further investigations he determined the minimum amount of fluorides necessary to cause fluorosis. In contrast to the 8 to 1 million ratio in certain fluoridated water areas, he determined the optimum level of fluoride to water concentration to be 1 part fluoride to 1 million parts water. Later, he and his associates developed efficient and economical methods for removing excess fluorides from drinking water and adding them when advisable.

In subsequent studies Dr. Dean made his momentous discovery of the inhibitive effect of fluoridated drinking water on dental caries. This most significant observation led directly to the current widespread public health measure of controlled fluoridation.

At the beginning of 1959 about 35 million people in nearly 1,800 communities in the United States were using fluoridated water.

After more than 10 years' study by the Dental Institute, it has been demonstrated beyond a doubt that fluoridation of public water supplies can reduce tooth decay by as much as 65 percent in certain age groups. Our children, even those whose teeth had already calcified before fluoridation was begun, are the principal beneficiaries of this program.

Over the years, Dr. Dean's professional interest has by no means been limited to the study of fluoridation. During his service with the Armed Forces, he studied other oral diseases, especially trench mouth, as it related to military populations. Throughout his career he has encouraged young investigators and, due mainly to his efforts, a well-balanced scientific staff carries on broad programs of clinical, laboratory, and epidemiological studies in dental health at the National Institute of Dental Research today. Dr. Dean has been prominent in pointing out the need for combining specialized dental research with work in the basic biological sciences.

Time and again Dr. Dean has been honored for his many contributions to the dental profession. He holds the Gorgas Medal and Award of the Association of Military Surgeons the Jarvie Fellowship Medal of the Dental Society of the State of New York, the John M. Goodell Prize of the American Public Health Association. He has been cited by the Georgetown University School of Dentistry with its award of merit. He is the only dentist ever to have been accorded the honor of delivering the Holme Lecture at the London University Hospital Medical College. He is an honorary member of the Royal Society of Medicine and the Finnish Dental Society, and will become an honorary member of the American Dental Association during its centennial session in September of this year.

Dr. Dean was also the first dentist to be made a member of the American Epidemiological Society and the Washington, D.C., Academy of Sciences. He is a past president of the International Association of Dental Research and a former vice president of the Federation Dentaire Internationale.

While an officer in the Public Health Service and more recently with the American Dental Association, Dr. Dean contributed over 90 professional papers dealing for the most part with his epidemiological studies to various scientific, public health, dental, medical, and engineering journals. Time and again he has ably represented his profession at scientific and professional meetings in the United States, Europe, and Latin America.

Now, after a lifetime devoted to improving the health of his fellow men, H. Trendley Dean has retired from the public scene.

Speaking for his countless friends and associates, I extend to him warm congratulations on his richly deserved retirement after so many years spent in humanity's service. I know that as a veteran public servant and eminent man of science Dr. Dean looks forward to maintaining all the cherished associations of his past.

We, his friends and admirers, wish him well and trust he will enjoy many more fruitful years with us.

LOSS TO CITIES BY VETO OF HOUSING BILL

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to an editorial which was published in the Denver Post of last Sunday, September 6, 1959. Since this is an editorial which comes from a paper which is not Republican but is independent in its thinking, I think the interpretation which is placed upon the President's veto of the housing bill last week is of great significance, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Denver Post, entitled "Cities Lost on Ike's Housing Veto," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITIES LOST ON IKE'S HOUSING VETO

President Eisenhower has won another veto fight, but at a great cost. This was the veto of the second housing bill (he vetoed the first one, too), which the Senate Friday failed by five votes to override.

The costs are mainly two. Whatever chance there existed this year of cooperation between the Republican administration and the Democratic Congress is now lost.

But more important, the Nation's cities have lost what was an excellent, though minimum, program in public housing, urban renewal and other urban programs.

Since housing legislation is the Federal Government's main contribution to the health of a national asset—its cities—it is easy to see how much loss of this bill will hurt. The cities will continue to subsidize a tremendous farm program but fail to share in much of a program themselves.

Congressional leaders were at their bitterest Friday after the veto, and they can hardly be blamed. While the President was in Europe patching the Atlantic Alliance, the same group of advisers who misguided him on the first housing bill did it again.

Congress had come a long way down the road to meet the President on housing policy. The second bill was a pared-down version of the first bill, which had been pared down from the bill the Senate first passed, which had been pared down from the original Democratic proposals.

The President, at a time when compromise was wise, has yet to take the first step.

How far is one side in a divided Government expected to go in meeting the views of the other? The Democratic Congress has been elected, too, just like the President, and more recently, to boot.

The use of the veto, when used indiscriminately, thwarts majority rule. In this case, it has allowed a conservative coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats to thwart the majority, no doubt with a deal for the Republicans to go easy on civil rights thrown into the bargain.

What will happen now is questionable. The Democratic leadership may swallow its pride and go back to work on still a third housing bill.

Even so, Congress is likely to let the Federal Housing Administration go hang before surrendering completely to the President, and with justification.

The next bill may go a little way more toward the President's position, but there aren't enough days left in this year for Congress to move all the way over to the White House demands.

The genius that has made progress possible in America is the finding of common ground on which to take action. If no legislation is enacted on housing this year (and therefore no progress made) the onus will be on those who refused to search for common ground.

THE FARMER AND THE OVERALL ECONOMY

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, recently the Kansas City Star published an editorial, which was fundamentally sound, entitled "The Farmer Is Still an Important Citizen."

This editorial contains a thoughtful discussion of the role of the farmer in the changing American economy. It points out the important role the farmer has played in our economic development in the past, and the important role he should play in the future.

In summation the editorial says:

In its dilemma agriculture requires the understanding of the urban population. In fact, it also demands greater understanding from farmers themselves. Agriculture is involved in vast changes—declining farm population, the increase in the size of farms and mechanization. The changes bring problems of adaption of technology, of staggering surpluses, and increased costs. The complex situation perplexes the experts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Kansas City Star of Sunday, August 30, 1959, entitled "The Farmer Is Still an Important Citizen," be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARMER IS STILL AN IMPORTANT CITIZEN

As we near the end of summer, this growing season is producing crops that approach last year's alltime record. Let's take our hats off to the farmer and take a good look at what he is doing for this country. For the moment let's deemphasize agriculture's price troubles.

The farm problem has dominated the agricultural scene for so long that it has become almost a legend. The public has become accustomed to day-by-day argument over farm programs, surpluses, subsidies, and parity. No wonder many people who are not fully familiar with the situation look upon the farmer as a man who can't run his own business and one who is always looking for a handout from the Government.

He does have his troubles, let's not deny it. But does America have any greater asset than its farmers?

Food is more important to the human race than any other product. In America, we haven't the slightest worry about where it is coming from. A great highway building program, industrial expansion, the production of luxury items, all can be undertaken with confidence in adequate manpower. Each year more and more people can be spared from the farm. This isn't true in many countries.

If our major worry were producing enough food we couldn't spare the manpower to turn out the many things that are a part of the modern American way of everyday living. Even in war, this country has not gone hungry. It has been the breadbasket for its allies.

Our farmers are producing this abundance with fewer and fewer workers. In the earliest years of the Nation, nearly all people were farmers. A man, who had the help of his family, produced enough for that family. Today's farmer produces enough for himself and 23 other persons. This point can't be overemphasized. If we are to be an industrial Nation, these other 23 people must have plenty of food and fiber. Economic progress halts whenever a nation fails to produce the necessities of life with less and less labor.

The farm surpluses troublesome to farmers and the Government, are in effect insurance. We are virtually guaranteed an abundance for months and years ahead. These surpluses bear down upon farm prices. It is ironic that the farm efficiency which produces the surpluses is so often costly to the farmer. In effect the farmer pays for the insurance against hunger in this country instead of collecting on it at the marketplace. We don't want continued surpluses that are too big to handle.

While the housewife may regard food prices high at the store, farm organization authorities point to the fact that an hour's work will buy more food today than ever before in history. Also, more and more of the cost of food is represented in the expenses of delivery, processing, retailing and built-in maid service.

No longer do you buy a live chicken and take it home to be killed and cleaned. In fact, more and more foods are fully prepared for cooking or even serving on the table. These services all add to the food bill.

Farmers resent charges that their prices account for the high cost of living. The reverse is true. In the cost of living index food prices have either held stable or dropped. If food had been going up, like everything else, obviously the cost of living today would be much higher than it is.

Last year Americans spent $57.7 billion for food. The farmers who grew it received about 36 percent of that amount.

So much has been said about farm subsidies that the average person may well believe that farmers alone have benefited from Government largess. Here again farm organizations, some of which are clearly unsatisfied with current farm programs, point out that farm subsidies are only a part of the benefits handed out through Government channels to American business. The tariff, they suggest, is the greatest subsidy ever granted business and labor. Its costs are hidden as the public pays through prices at the market rather than in taxes as in the case with farm subsidies.

Subsidies helped build the railroads, ships, and airlines. Government payment of postal deficits subsidizes mail costs of magazines and other publications. Government contracts assure profits to manufacturers of war materials. In fact, an extremely impressive list of subsidies can be developed by those who wish to make the point that farmers are not alone in getting financial assistance from Uncle Sam.

Of course, the fact that someone else has or is receiving a subsidy does not automatically indicate that farmers, also, should be put into a Government program. Neither does the amazing job of producing food necessarily suggest that they should have Government aid. The Nation faces a practical problem of finding a workable plan. The farmers are dissatisfied with their present lot, despite 30 years of Government programs. This fact indicates that subsidies do not automatically solve their problems.

Too many people are ready to suggest adoption of any kind of a government price support program on the theory that others are getting theirs, too. Conceivably, if farmers were better off without any programs, it would be logical to eliminate the programs. We don't think this is going to be done, but the theory holds just the same.

Agriculture is tremendously important to the economy of the Nation. Kansas City always has realized this fact. It was given a forceful demonstration in the spring of 1958 when improving conditions on the farm sparked a strong pickup in business.

Agriculture is a dynamic industry despite its price troubles. Since 1940 total farm output has increased 40 percent. During the same period the number of farmers or farmworkers has dropped faster than at any time in history. Today's farmer produces as much in an hour as he did in 2 hours in 1940. Nonfarm labor and manufacturing productivity, on the other hand, have increased slightly less than 50 percent in the same period.

Recently C. Peairs Wilson, director of the School of Agriculture at Kansas State University, compiled data to show the status of agriculture in the American economy. He found among other things:

Agriculture is the biggest buyer, seller and borrower in the United States.

The inventory of farm machinery alone is greater than the assets of the American steel industry and five times that of the automobile industry.

Agriculture uses 6½ million tons of finished steel a year—more than is used in a year's output of passenger cars. It consumes 17½ billion gallons of crude petroleum—more than is used by any other industry—and 285 million pounds of raw rubber—enough to make tires for 6 million motorcars. Agriculture takes 22 billion kilowatt hours of electrical power—more than enough to serve Chicago, Detroit, Baltimore, and Houston for a year.

Each year farmers purchase farm supplies worth about $16 billion.

The agricultural plant each year increases its use of capital, of science and technology, of management and research.

There are twice as many jobs in industries that serve farmers as in farming.

The U.S. population is increasing rapidly. Right now it is about 177 million. A conservative estimate used by Government authorities is that the population will grow from the present 177 million to 230 million by 1975. This means total farm production must be increased another 35 to 45 percent by that time. No one doubts that it will be done. Presumably there will come a day in the distant future when the country, along with all others, may face food shortages. But this generation in America has no fears.

What does this summation of the farm situation suggest?

First, we should not discount the importance of farming to the Nation just because we have no worries about food or because farmers presumably are always caught in price troubles. Per capita income on farms is about half the income of nonfarm employment. This is disparity. A way to change it must be found.

In its dilemma agriculture requires the understanding of the urban population. In fact, it also demands greater understanding from farmers themselves. Agriculture is involved in vast changes—declining farm population, the increase in the size of farms and mechanization. The changes bring problems of adaption of technology, of staggering surpluses and increased costs. The complex situation perplexes the experts.

Because of their strength, industry and labor unions have been able to a large degree to take care of themselves. Farmers, as individuals, have turned to the Government in the hope of getting a better share of national income. Years of dissatisfaction suggest that the Government programs to date have not been successful. More changes are in order.

Let's not count the farmer out. He's a mighty important fellow to have around.

THE KHRUSHCHEV VISIT

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, a thought-provoking article "The Khrushchev Visit: Dangers and Hopes," by Dr. Henry Kissinger, associate director of the center for international studies at Harvard University, was published Sunday in the New York Times magazine.

This article about the planned visit points out that issues are far more important than personalities.

Included in the issues which must be resolved with the Communists are: First, suppression of freedom in Europe; second, refusal to accept control of arms; third, continued pressure on peripheral areas, including Laos; and, fourth, the current unprovoked threat on Berlin.

The article points out what we all realize, but do not like to talk much about, namely, the fact that Khrushchev has already obtained more than he asked for, a summit meeting at the top—plus what is even more important to him, a meeting without our allies present.

The article points up the West now hangs on Mr. Khrushchev's erratic announcements, with ourselves and our allies split as to what should be done.

We have now seated East Germany at Geneva.

We are in a paradoxical military position. Our strength lies largely in the hydrogen weapons of our strategic striking forces, but few people believe we would unleash those bombs over the Berlin issue.

Nevertheless, our conventional forces have been reduced to where they are an insufficient deterrent against the Communists.

At the time we said we would not give an inch, we were continuing to reduce our military forces. A realist like Khrushchev could only be encouraged by such action.

A sentence in this article every citizen could well read says:

> We may be deflected from the long-overdue reexamination of our policies, both diplomatic and military, if the impression is created that the fact of a conference is more important than the substance of what it achieves.

Regardless of any planned trips, every informed person is now asking, What will these visits do to NATO?

The article presents the issue squarely when it continues:

> We have never had too much difficulty obtaining Soviet agreement in principle. The frustration has arisen because principle has proved impossible to translate into action. Free elections, control of arms, German unification, are slogans to which the Soviet Union agreed and which nevertheless mark the disappointment of our hopes for a peaceful world.

Mr. Kissinger says:

> At the very least, the Khrushchev visit will have gained time, and that in the nuclear age is a precious commodity.
> But time is neutral. It is an ally only of those with the energy and conviction to use it properly.

But time can be more than neutral. It can be negative because time, once lost, can never be regained.

I agree with this article when it says:

If we employ it [time] to change the attitudes which produced this crisis, the exchange of visits may mark a turning point in postwar history. If we use it to justify the continuation of our present course we shall have purchased a lull that will make disaster inevitable.

What informed person would want to argue with the next-to-last paragraph of the article:

We must admit to ourselves that we are in grave danger. We have to strengthen allied unity. The West has to develop more conviction about its programs than it mustered at the Geneva foreign ministers' meeting. We must remedy the military weakness that invites constant Soviet pressure. It simply does not make sense for NATO, comprising twice the manpower and three times the industrial resources of the U.S.S.R., to assert that it is unable to afford what is so plainly required for its survival.

And most important, who would disagree with its last sentences:

A policy concerned primarily with equilibrium and normalcy is not equal to the challenge of a revolutionary period. Deeper values are at stake than the ability to produce consumer goods. Our task, as that of every generation, is to make our belief in freedom and human dignity relevant to our times. To do this, it is necessary that we end the obsession with Soviet intentions and seek to become clear about our own.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Kissinger's article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE KHRUSHCHEV VISIT: DANGERS AND HOPES

(By Henry A. Kissinger)

(An observer warns of the hazards in the Soviet Premier's talks with the President, and suggests a course for the West to take to turn them to its own advantage.)

In 9 days Premier Khrushchev is to arrive in the United States. His every gesture will be watched for significance; his every smile will be reported as a harbinger of a happier world; his every affirmation of the desirability of peace will be taken as a sign that Soviet policy has entered a new phase.

In these circumstances it seems almost ungracious to express a word of caution. But it is dangerous for democracies to act as if all issues could be reduced to personalities. The cold war is not the result of a misunderstanding between our leaders and those of the Soviet Union. It is the product of a conscious Soviet policy which includes the suppression of freedom in Eastern Europe (it is less than 15 months since the execution of Imre Nagy of Hungary); the Soviet refusal to accept schemes for the control of arms; Communist pressure on all peripheral areas, of which Laos is only the most recent example; the unprovoked threat on Berlin. A solution of the cold war can be found only in relation to these issues.

The exchange of visits will assist the cause of peace only if it provides a basis for dealing with these problems. It will be beneficial to the extent that it gives the Soviet leader an incentive to reverse a course which has repeatedly brought the world to the brink of war. Yet the circumstances in which the visits will take place do not inspire optimism in this respect. If Mr. Khrushchev compares his position now with what it was last November, when he first threatened Berlin, he may well conclude that bellicosity has its rewards. As a result of his pressure on Berlin, accompanied by threats of missile and nuclear attacks, Mr. Khrushchev has already gained the following points:

(1) A meeting at the top without withdrawing the threat to Berlin. Whatever the desirability of a visit by Mr. Khrushchev to the United States in the abstract, under present conditions it is a Soviet tactical victory. From the start of the Berlin crisis, we insisted that we would not go to a summit conference under duress, that there had to be some "progress" at a lower level before the heads of state convened. Throughout, Mr. Khrushchev has mentioned that the foreign ministers could settle nothing and that the "heavyweights" should talk. The threat to Berlin has not been withdrawn; the Geneva foreign ministers' meeting was a complete failure. Yet Mr. Khrushchev has done better than achieve a four-power conference. He has been invited to meetings with the President from which our allies are excluded.

(2) A demonstration of the lack of purpose in the West. The immediate reaction to the Soviet threat to Berlin was a public debate on what concessions might be made and public accusations of bad faith and irresolution among the Allies. Three weeks before the foreign ministers' conference there was still no agreed Western position, and the tentativeness with which the Western plan was presented revealed that the West lacks a clear conception of the purposes for which it might strive.

Rather than concentrating on restoring its unity or developing its own program, the West has been obsessed with determining Soviet intentions. Delegations of political leaders from most countries of the Atlantic community and from almost every political party have descended on the Communist capital. Moscow has become the focus of diplomatic activity. The West has hung on Mr. Khrushchev's erratic pronouncements as if it could do nothing save in reaction to Soviet moves. The Eisenhower-Khrushchev meetings are the culmination of a trend which has seen the Western alliance dangerously close to being split, with each ally essaying his own diplomatic approach.

(3) A hardening of the dividing lines in Germany. The attempt by Germany to pursue an isolated policy in the center of the Continent has produced disaster for Europe twice within a generation. One of the important goals of our policy must therefore be to retain Germany as a willing member of the Western community. If Germany should feel forsaken by its allies, it may seek to realize its aims by separate dealings with the East. And among these aims, unification will always occupy a key role. Thus for us a great deal depends on demonstrating that only Soviet intransigency keeps Germany divided. Any other course will in time produce what we should fear most: a dissatisfied, militant power in Central Europe.

When an East German delegation was seated at Geneva, a major step was taken not only toward the perpetuation of the division of Germany but toward our acceptance of the East German puppet regime. This was underscored by the lack of conviction with which the Western plan for German unification was presented and the haste with which it was pigeonholed at the first sign of opposition. After the first week in Geneva, the foreign ministers dealt with only one problem: the transformation of our position in Berlin, for which the quid pro quo was to be the withdrawal of a Soviet threat. We were asked to give up our rights while the Soviets would give up a menace. By accepting what amounted to a proposal that we solve problems the Soviet Union had created, we were placed in the demoralizing position of letting our well-established rights be called in question with no better argument than that they had become abnormal.

(4) The demonstration of a basic weakness in Western military policy. In our belief that deterrence is best achieved through the threat of maximum destructiveness, we have placed our principal reliance on nuclear weapons and strategic bombing. We were thus caught in the dilemma of deciding whether Berlin is worth the tens of millions of casualties of an all-out nuclear war. And it does not matter how determined we really are: if the Soviet leaders doubt our resolution they may provoke the crisis we are striving to avoid.

President Eisenhower is reported to have expressed puzzlement that our repeated warnings that we would fight for Berlin have apparently failed to impress Mr. Khrushchev greatly. The reason is not hard to find: our threat to resort to our only strategy has lost its credibility, not because our leaders are irresolute but because the threat of all-out war has become inherently implausible.

Moreover, once Soviet pressure had begun, few of our actions were calculated to reinforce our words. We did nothing to remedy the weakness of NATO's ground forces; on the contrary, we reduced both our Army and the Marines. We kept stressing the priority of long-range balance over readiness as if we did not face an immediate crisis. These actions may have encouraged a Soviet belief that our show of determination was bluff, that in our quest for relief from the burdens of military expenditures we might be induced to give up our other interests.

When we assess the exchange of visits between the President and Premier Khrushchev in this context, the potential dangers of the meetings emerge clearly. In my opinion, they are:

(1) The risk of euphoria. Some of our allies seem to feel that anyone who warns against overoptimism seeks to avoid a settlement. This is not true; no one can be opposed to a genuine end of the cold war. But we must guard against succumbing to the illusion of relaxation while the causes of the cold war remain unsolved and new crises build up in an atmosphere of blandness and normalcy. And there is a grave danger that the American people will be lulled into complacency by abstract protestations of good will; that we will confuse personal affability with a change of attitude. We may be deflected from the long-overdue reexamination of our policies, both diplomatic and military, if the impression is created that the fact of a conference is more important than the substance of what it achieves.

(2) Weakening allied ties. One of the characteristics of the postwar period has been the decline in power and influence of Europe. But one of the paradoxical results of Europe's new status has been a tendency to exaggerate its weakness. As a result, Europe has not fulfilled all her potentialities for political initiative.

It is important that the conferences between the President and Mr. Khrushchev do nothing to increase this sense of impotence. Our European allies must not be given the impression that matters affecting their most vital interests can be negotiated without their participation. No one who has read the President's remarks in the course of his European trip could suspect that Mr. Eisenhower would betray our allies. But separate conversations could underscore the junior position of our partners and be a blow to their self-respect.

We must take care that we do not reduce any future summit meeting to ratifying decisions taken by the United States and the U.S.S.R. Mr. Khrushchev has already sought to exploit this possibility. He has stated that after his meeting with the President there might be a conference including our European allies plus Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. We must guard against having our allies reduced to the status of the East European satellites.

President de Gaulle's reported plan to visit Moscow, following the Macmillan trip to Russia and the Eisenhower-Khrushchev exchange, indicates that a situation could come about in which allied unity—in the diplomatic field, at least—would be little more than a formal pose. If the principle of separate dealings becomes established, we may well be the victims of the next phase of Soviet policy, when an attempt may be made to appeal to our allies against us.

(3) The demoralization of the free world. It is a Soviet goal to reduce contemporary issues to a clash of personalities in an effort to make us forget that the cold war has been caused by specific Soviet aggressive actions and that it can be ended only in relation to these issues. The more the Soviets can give the impression that crises stem from individuals (Adenauer's rigidity, Truman's failure to follow Roosevelt's policies, etc.), the more uncertain the free world will become, for in any Soviet-provoked crisis the West will be tempted to blame its own leaders or to search desperately for a new approach that will somehow end all tensions. Mr. Khrushchev may indeed make the ultimate decisions in the Soviet Union—as many advocates of conversations at the top maintain. It is nonetheless dangerous for democracies to permit a dictatorship to impose its manner of conducting affairs on them too completely.

Now that the invitation to Mr. Khrushchev has been issued, we must consider how the exchange of visits can be made to bring the best results.

It is likely that Mr. Khrushchev suffers from severe misconceptions about the nature of American society. Although it is not easy to imagine what the Soviet leader is likely to see in a cross-country trip of 6 days to change the attitudes of a lifetime, he should learn of the unity of the American people. Unless Soviet doctrine blinds him completely, he may come to understand, if he ever doubted it, that America has no aggressive designs, that it is unthinkable for the United States ever to initiate hostilities. At the same time, he may realize that the American people will be as one in resisting any attempt to achieve world domination. He could gain an appreciation of our strength and our productive capacity.

Mr. Khrushchev cannot fail to notice the sincerity of the President when Mr. Eisenhower says, as he has repeatedly, that in a nuclear war both sides must lose, but that, if the Soviet Union is prepared to seek security through negotiations and to forego the quest for empire, it will find us conciliatory and imaginative. And the conversations between Mr. Eisenhower and Mr. Khrushchev will demonstrate our desire for peace to the rest of the world.

Nevertheless, we face a delicate task in the forthcoming meetings. If we negotiate about specific settlements we may disrupt the Western alliance by giving our allies the impression that major decisions are being taken in their absence. On the other hand, if we confine ourselves to generalities we may confuse our people. In that case it will never be clear what was decided upon. Misinterpretation or misunderstanding will be encouraged. We shall not be able to convey even to the Soviet leaders our understanding of the causes of current tensions and the means to overcome them.

We have never had too much difficulty obtaining Soviet agreement in principle. The frustration has arisen because principle has proved impossible to translate into action. Free elections, control of arms, German unification are slogans to which the Soviet Union agreed and which nevertheless mark the disappointment of our hopes for a peaceful world.

It therefore seems important that we tell Mr. Khrushchev frankly of the perils of his present course, that we put before him as concretely as possible what we consider to be a stable world and invite him to detailed negotiations later on in which our allies will participate. If nothing is achieved by the visit but an agreement to end the methods which made a travesty of the Geneva foreign ministers' meeting and to negotiate seriously, a great deal will have been gained.

Yet we shall not succeed in this effort unless we develop a much clearer conception of our purpose in the world. If we are unable to define positive goals we shall continue to oscillate between an excessive reliance on personalities and a frantic search for tactical expedients, confusing flexibility with bargaining technique.

We cannot carry out President Eisenhower's determination to explore every avenue that might lead to peace unless we are clear about what we understand by the elements of a peaceful world. A dispatch from Washington by James Reston in the New York Times of August 12 indicates our difficulties: "Now that President Eisenhower has agreed to talk to Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, the hunt is on here for specific proposals to talk about."

Our people must be told of the perils we face and the task before us. They must understand that the cold war cannot be ended by a smile; that it requires specific adjustments expressed in a concrete program. An improvement in the atmosphere is a useful first step, but it will prove as ephemeral as the "spirit of Geneva" if we use it as an excuse to relax our effort.

At the very least, the Khrushchev visit will have gained time, and that in the nuclear age is a precious commodity. But time is neutral. It is an ally only of those with the energy and conviction to use it properly. If we employ it to change the attitudes which produced this crisis, the exchange of visits may mark a turning point in postwar history. If we use it to justify the continuation of our present course we shall have purchased a lull that will make disaster inevitable.

We must admit to ourselves that we are in grave danger. We have to strengthen allied unity. The West has to develop more conviction about its programs than it mustered at the Geneva foreign ministers' meeting. We must remedy the military weakness that invites constant Soviet pressure. It simply does not make sense for NATO, comprising twice the manpower and three times the industrial resources of the U.S.S.R., to assert that it is unable to afford what is so plainly required for its survival.

The ultimate problem far transcends that of communism. Indeed we will be able to deal with communism effectively only to the degree that we act constructively with respect to tasks much more directly in our control, such as increasing the cohesion and growth of the Western World and fostering the development of the emergent nations. Here many opportunities await only our dedication and imagination. A policy concerned primarily with equilibrium and normalcy is not equal to the challenge of a revolutionary period. Deeper values are at stake than the ability to produce consumer goods. Our task, as that of every generation, is to make our belief in freedom and human dignity relevant to our times. To do this, it is necessary that we end the obsession with Soviet intentions, and seek to become clear about our own.

HOUSING VETO HURTS OREGON

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, a recent editorial in the Washington Post and Times Herald succinctly summarized the views of many regarding President Eisenhower's veto of the second housing bill passed by Congress this session. The Post stated:

> The President's successful veto of the omnibus housing bill can be seen as a triumph of sterile doctrine over a serious public need.

Mr. President, as the Post editorial points out:

> Because of the need, and because of the noncontroversial features of the vetoed bill, one last effort must be made to pass some form of legislation. Supporters of Federal housing programs can be given some wry pessimism, however, about an administration that seems to keep the nurse buried under a mattress while the front door sags on its hinges.

During the last few days I have received several messages from Oregon commenting on the consequences of the President's action.

Dr. Harry Dillin, president of Linfield College, wired me that his school has started building a dormitory and cafeteria. Without a housing bill to aid financing, construction will likely be halted.

A. L. Bell, president of the Salem Home Builders Association, has informed me of the concern of his organization regarding housing legislation and urging legislation this year.

C. Henry Bacon, Jr., president of the Douglas Fir Plywood Association, telegraphed me that "the effect of a slowdown in home construction will be serious for every plywood manufacturer and employee because of our great dependence on home building."

The administration, by its continual advocacy of a tight money policy and refusal to support even minimal Federal housing programs, is retarding efforts to insure that all Americans have a decent dwelling place and creating a serious threat to the economic health of those lumber-producing States who rely on residential construction markets.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there appear at the conclusion of my remarks the entire editorial, "Housing Holocaust," from the September 5, 1959, issue of the Washington Post and Times Herald; the text of the three telegrams to which I referred; and my statement submitted to the Senate Housing Subcommittee earlier this year in behalf of an adequate Federal housing program.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 5, 1959]

HOUSING HOLOCAUST

The President's successful veto of the omnibus housing bill can be seen as a triumph of sterile doctrine over a serious public need. That the bill was imperfect was clear even to the Senators who sought vainly to override the veto. But after Mr. Eisenhower vetoed a more costly housing bill last July, an effort was made to frame legislation which would be more acceptable to the administration. Yet an all-or-nothing mood seemed to prevail in the White House (and the Bureau of the Budget), and the specter of spending was invoked again in rejecting the pared-down, $1.05 billion measure. Mr. Eisenhower felt the legislation went too far, and he supported his case in part by overstating the bill's cost.

What makes the President's action so regrettable is that it may well rule out any housing legislation before adjournment—despite his professed hopes to the contrary. The urban renewal program is touching the bottom of its funds and the Federal Housing Administration has already run out of mortgage insurance authority, and lack of legislation may mean the death of this noncontroversial program. Perhaps in assembling an omnibus measure the Senate was ill-advised to tack on an unrelated college-classroom loan program—but surely a single termite on a rafter does not require the razing of a barn.

Fiscal, rather than policy questions, were stressed most in the President's veto message. Assuredly the administration faces pressing budgetary problems, although the President's successful (and proper) veto of the public works bill should reduce them. But in terms of priority, how many items rank higher than the need to help restore blight-infected cities to greater health? The veto message came the same week that slum-bred gang wars became a central concern in New York. Because of the need, and because of the noncontroversial features of the vetoed bill, one last effort must be made to pass some form of legislation. Supporters of Federal housing programs can be forgiven some wry pessimism, however, about an administration that seems to keep the purse buried under a mattress while the front door sags on its hinges.

McMINNVILLE, OREG., September 5, 1959.
Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Washington, D.C.:

Last week Linfield started building dormitory and cafeteria hoping housing bill would be approved or veto overrider. Because of tight money and no housing loan our board meets next week for decision to stop construction. Is there likelihood of some housing bill for colleges in this session.

HARRY DILLIN,
President, Linfield College.

PORTLAND, OREG., September 6, 1959.
Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building:

Acceptable housing bill of utmost importance to Oregon. National Home Week good time to break.

A. L. BELL,
President,
Salem Home Builders Association.

TACOMA, WASH., September 5, 1959.
Hon. RICHARD NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Regret to learn housing bill has been vetoed. On behalf of the 40,000 employees and 123 manufacturers in the fir plywood industry on the west coast, our industry has asked me to urge you to bend every effort to pass a housing bill before adjournment. The effect of a slowdown in home construction will be serious for every plywood manufacturer and employee because of our great dependence on home building.

C. HENRY BACON, Jr.,
President,
Douglas Fir Plywood Association.

[From hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency on Housing Act of 1959, Jan. 22, 23, 26, 27, and 28, 1959]

STATEMENT OF RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OREGON

Our Federal Government has a clear duty to insure that all Americans are able to secure adequate housing. Despite vigorous efforts by many in Congress, this responsibility has not been effectively discharged in the last half decade.

An estimated 13 million substandard dwelling units exist in the United States today. Net household formation and destruction of old residential structures creates a demand for approximately 1.4 million net units each year. If the Nation's present slums are to be eliminated and current housing needs met, at least 2 million homes a year must be constructed for a period of at least 20 years. We have come no closer to this goal than 1.3 million during the last 6 years.

Government's failure to meet its obligation has been both unintentional and deliberate. Some have failed to realize the magnitude of the problem. Others argued that the workings of the economy would solve the shortage. Still others seemed to hope that the situation would just go away. But the need remains—large, uncorrected, and omnipresent.

Housing demand, as opposed to need, depends on a variety of factors; individual economic well-being, new family formation, migration of population, obsolescence, vacancy rates, and ease of financing. The first and last elements are of critical importance. Unlike the others, they can—and should—be directly influenced by Government action.

Both factors are of concern to this subcommittee. Housing not only provides shelter; it also provides jobs.

Gross national product is approaching an annual rate of $450 billion—the highest in history. Yet, 4 million persons—6 percent of the labor force—are unemployed. This problem of poverty amongst plenty spurred passage of the depressed areas bill in 1958. It dictates consideration of the stimulatory effects of housing legislation.

In 1955, the value of private nonfarm residential construction in the United States amounted to $18.7 billion. In 1956, the figure was $17.6 billion and in 1957 value totaled $16.6 billion. (Preliminary statistics for 1958 indicate an increase in value, in part a reflection of the rising price level.)

These statistics reveal two pertinent facts: Residential construction represents a significant segment of national income and this sector of the economy has exhibited a continuous downward trend over the last 3 years for which accurate calculations are available.

Lumber and wood products manufacturing is a major supporting industry in the field of residential construction. In 1956, over 80 percent of nonfarm one-family houses, for which building permits were issued or work started, were frame dwellings. Twenty-four percent were wood-faced.

The manufacture of lumber and wood products is the largest manufacturing employment factor in the State of Oregon. Over 75,000 persons are employed within this classification by some 3,859 establishments, 164 of which employ 100 persons or more. (This total constitutes more than 10 percent of total national employment in this category.) Approximately 56 percent of all persons employed by manufacturing firms in Oregon are engaged in the production of lumber and wood products. Dollar value added by manufacture in 1956 was $573,672,000.

Oregon produces nearly one-fourth of the Nation's boards and planks. About three-fourths of this supply is utilized in residential construction. If residential construction is down, the lumber industry is down. This is axiomatic.

In 1958 lumber production nationally hit the lowest level in 13 years, despite an upturn in the final part of the year. Output was estimated at 32 billion board feet—3.3 percent less than in 1957. The last year production dipped below the 1958 level was in 1945. Consumption last year was estimated at about 36.1 billion feet, a figure near the 1957 amount but considerably below the levels of the preceding 7 years.

A major factor in this poor lumber market year was housing. In February 1958 the private seasonally adjusted annual rate for housing starts dropped to 915,000. An upsurge in the second half of the year resulted in a total of 1,130,600 starts for the year and private seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1,430,000 in December. Whether this pace will continue in 1959 remains doubtful. As the New York Times year-end report on the lumber industry stated:

"Lumbermen were hopeful of some improvement in lumber markets this year after 3 years of decline * * * These hopes were conditioned by fear that limits on credit might hamper homebuilding, one of lumber's principal outlets. Credit has been tightened in recent months and probably will have some effect on housing in the early part of this year."

The fear of lumbermen is well founded. Monetary manipulation of credit policy has drastically affected residential construction in the past. Examination of effective interest rates and monthly seasonally adjusted private housing starts over the past 6 years reveals a remarkably consistent inverse relationship.

Administration attempts to restrain expansionary tendencies in the spring of 1953 caused a marked rise in interest rates in the early part of that year. A decline in housing starts followed. The recession of 1953–54 saw an easing of credit restriction. Housing starts began a steady climb, reaching a high in late 1954. Recession recovery began in the third quarter of 1954 and the administration initiated a policy of restraint. Shortly thereafter housing starts began a long downward trend which continued until the second quarter of 1958. Although in the fall of 1957 there were numerous signs that pointed to a decline in economic activity, the administration failed to reverse its tight money policy until late in November.

Despite difficulty of computing time lags and assessing other pertinent factors, there is no doubt of the causal relationship between the cost of mortgage money and new residential construction.

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is H.R. 9035.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc and that the bill, as amended, be treated as original text for purpose of further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The committee amendments, agreed to en bloc, are as follows:

On page 3, line 17, after the word "for", to strike out "another nontransferable obligation of the United States" and insert "a series H United States savings bond"; on page 4, line 1, after the word "which", to strike out "the obligation" and insert "such obligation of the United States or such series H bond, as the case may be"; at the beginning of line 4, to insert "of such obligation of the United States or of such series H bond"; on page 6, in the heading, line 13, to strike out "Obligations" and insert "Savings Bonds"; after line 17, to strike out:

"SEC. 1037. Certain exchanges of United States obligations.

"(a) GENERAL RULE. When so provided by regulations promulgated by the Secretary in connection with the issue of obligations of the United States, no gain or loss shall be recognized on the surrender to the United States of obligations of the United States issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act in exchange solely for other obligations issued under such Act.

"(b) APPLICATIONS OF SECTION 1232.

"(1) EXCHANGES INVOLVING OBLIGATIONS ISSUED AT A DISCOUNT.—In any case in which gain has been realized but not recognized because of the provisions of subsection (a) (or so much of section 1031(b) as relates to subsection (a) of this section), to the extent such gain is later recognized by reason of a disposition or redemption of an obligation received in an exchange subject to such provisions, the first sentence of section 1232(a)(2)(A) shall apply to such gain as though the obligation disposed of or redeemed were the obligation surrendered to the Government in the exchange rather than the obligation actually disposed of or redeemed. For purposes of this paragraph and section 1232, if the obligation surrendered in the exchange is a nontransferable obligation described in subsection (a) or (c) of section 454—

"(A) the aggregate amount considered, with respect to the obligation surrendered, as gain from the sale or exchange of property which is not a capital asset shall not exceed the difference between the issue price and the stated redemption price which applies at the time of the exchange, and

"(B) the issue price of the obligation received in the exchange shall be considered to be the stated redemption price of the obligation surrendered in the exchange, increased by the amount of other consideration (if any) paid to the United States as a part of the exchange.

"(2) EXCHANGES OF TRANSFERABLE OBLIGATIONS ISSUED AT NOT LESS THAN PAR.—In any case which subsection (a) (or so much of section 1031 (b) or (c) as relates to subsection (a) of this section) has applied to the exchange of a transferable obligation which was issued at not less than par for another transferable obligation, the issue price of the obligation received from the Government in the exchange shall be considered for purposes of applying section 1232 to be the same as the issue price of the obligation surrendered to the Government in the exchange, increased by the amount of other consideration (if any) paid to the United States as a part of the exchange.

"(c) CROSS REFERENCES.—

"(1) For rules relating to the recognition of gain or loss in a case where subsection (a) would apply except for the fact that the exchange was not made solely for other obligations of the United States, see subsections (b) and (c) of section 1031.

"(2) For rules relating to the basis of obligations of the United States acquired in an exchange for other obligations described in subsection (a), see subsection (d) of section 1031."

And, in lieu thereof, to insert:

"SEC. 1037. CERTAIN EXCHANGES OF UNITED STATES SAVINGS BONDS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—When so provided by regulations promulgated by the Secretary under section 22 of the Second Liberty Bond Act, no gain or loss shall be recognized on the surrender to the United States of series E United States savings bonds in exchange solely for series H United States savings bonds.

"(b) APPLICATION OF SECTION 1232.—In any case in which gain has been realized but not recognized because of the provisions of subsection (a) (or so much of section 1031(b) as relates to subsection (a) of this section), to the extent such gain is later recognized by reason of a disposition or redemption of a series H bond received in an exchange subject to such provisions, the first sentence of section 1232(a)(2)(A) shall apply to such gain as though the series H bond disposed of or redeemed were the series E bond surrendered to the Government in the exchange rather than the series H bond actually disposed of or redeemed. for purposes of this subsection and section 1232—

"(1) the aggregate amount considered, with respect to the series E bond surrendered, as gain from the sale or exchange of property which is not a capital asset shall not exceed the difference between the issue price and the stated redemption price which applies at the time of the exchange, and

"(2) the issue price of the series H bond received in the exchange shall be considered to be the stated redemption price of the series E bond surrendered in the exchange, increased by the amount of other consideration (if any) paid to the United States as a part of the exchange.

"(c) CROSS REFERENCES.—

And on page 10, in the wording after line 12, after the word "States", to strike out "obligations" and insert "savings bonds."

THE NEED FOR A REALISTIC INTEREST RATE

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, there is no more serious or difficult problem facing our country today than the economic one. The combination of persistent inflation, plus a $12½ billion increase in the national debt during the last fiscal year, plus the pressure of rapid recovery and growth, all coming at once, have accentuated the difficulties of debt management. In such a time, the Secretary of the Treasury should be free to take any needed action to handle his job, and certainly should not be plagued by a World War I interest ceiling.

Unfortunately, the situation has seemed to some of the administration's political opponents to offer them a political issue—easy money. They have labored and belabored it for at least 2 years, but it seems to the Senator from Utah that all it has brought them so far is a sense of frustration. In spite of all they have said, most economists and commentators, as well as the public, stand with the President in calling for conservative economic policies. So deep is this frustration that responsible newswriters and commentators such as J. L. Livingston, who does a syndicated economic column, and Edward Collins, of the New York Times, have been attacked and ridiculed here on the floor of the Senate because they do not follow the easy money line.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks the column of Mr. Livingston which appeared in the Washington Post on September 6.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRICE OF PROSPERITY IS HIGH MONEY RATE

(By J. A. Livingston)

Prosperity—and that's what we're having despite the prolonged steel strike—can only be had at a price.

We—you and I and everyone else—are paying for record personal income, high employment, and a construction boom, in the higher price of money. Interest rates have gone up again.

This isn't going to please some Congressmen who favor plenty of credit at a low price. And, most emphatically, it doesn't please Wall Street. Stock prices sold off within 5 minutes after the First National City Bank of New York announced that the prime rate would be 5 percent instead of 4½ percent. Other banks across the Nation followed:

The prime rate is the price of money to banks' biggest and best customers, customers such as Sears, Roebuck, General Motors, Continental Can, and so on. Yet, when the prime rate notches up, the rates charged smaller businessmen go up. The costs of financing homes, automobiles, trips to Europe rise, too. States, cities, towns, and school and water districts also have to pay more when they borrow.

BONDS VERSUS STOCKS

Immediately, bonds went down in price, and that's why Wall Street "spazzed." Many U.S. Treasury securities sold at alltime lows. Government issues can now be bought to yield better than 4½ percent. Many tax-exempt municipal bonds yield 4½ percent and 5 percent. Excellent corporate bonds yield 5 percent plus. This puts pressure on stocks.

Numerous high-grade industrial stocks yield only about 3 percent. But the lure of higher dividends to come and the fear of inflation have persuaded most investors to accept the lower return. But how long can this go on? That's what canny Wall Streeters wonder.

A higher price for money was an inevitable consequence of prosperity. The Nation's banks are "loaned up." Their customers are borrowing $12 billion more than a year ago. To meet this demand, commercial banks have sold $3 billion in Government bonds. Also, they, themselves, are borrowing about a billion dollars from the Federal Reserve System, some $800 million more than a year ago.

THE INFLATION ILLUSION

The jump in interest rates reemphasizes the deep schism in Washington. President Eisenhower, Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, and Federal Reserve Board Chairman Martin argue that easy money leads to inflation. In the period since 1955, we've had a 13-percent rise in per capita personal income. But only 30 percent of the advance was real. Seventy percent was the result of higher prices.

The Reserve has supported Secretary Anderson's request to Congress for elimination of the 3.26-percent ceiling on savings bonds and the 4¼-percent ceiling on long-term marketable Government bonds.

Many Democratic Congressmen reject this thesis. They say credit restraint fosters inflation by curbing production. If we had more goods, prices wouldn't advance.

POLITICAL ISSUE IN 1960?

Anderson has been unable to get the Democratic Congress to eliminate the 4¼-percent interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds. However, the 3.26-percent ceiling on E- and H-bonds is likely to be raised to 3¾ percent in a last minute push.

This monetary issue will persist long after the steel strike is settled. It could become a major campaign issue in 1960—a repeat of the Bryan-McKinley cross-of-gold contests of 1896 and 1900.

What Congressmen, in all political honesty, are groping for is an answer to this question: How do you raise the standard of living for everyone efficiently and satisfactorily?

President Eisenhower answers: Through a balanced budget and restraint on the money supply. If the money supply is restricted, then businessmen and labor unions won't be able to make price-boosting wage agreements.

APOLOGIA FOR MONEY RESTRAINT

Prof. Sidney Weintraub, in his recent book, "A General Theory of the Price Level, Output, Income Distribution, and Economic Growth," expressed the countervailing argument. He says prices depend not on the money supply but on the level of wages.

Therefore, he would suggest that before companies in basic industries, such as steel, autos, rubber, aluminum, etc., raise wages and prices, they should first publish their plans. This would subject their decisions to public reaction, probably to public hearings. The argument against this proposal is that ultimately it would force the Government to intervene directly.

Hence, the administration leans toward indirect restraint, even though—as the postwar record shows—it hasn't stopped inflation. Defenders of monetary policy apologize for its poor performance by saying: "A continually unbalanced budget is bound to have an inflationary impact on prices." I am one of these apologists.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, so strong is the desire of the "easy money" advocates for immediate power that by denying the Treasury full freedom they are apparently willing to assume the responsibility for the consequences of that denial of freedom.

The bill before us is a denial to the Secretary of full freedom, because it preserves the 4¼-percent ceiling on interest on long-term marketable U.S. bonds imposed in 1918.

Under the circumstances under which we are now working, I shall support the bill as it came from the Finance Committee and shall oppose any amendments if they are offered. But the ultimate need to solve this problem by providing the Secretary with full freedom still remains and the reasons why the ceiling should be lifted must be made clear if this record is to be complete. That is the purpose of this statement.

I repeat, I do not intend to offer any amendments to the bill as it came from the committee, and I shall support the committee's position, and oppose any amendments.

Congress was asked earlier by the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the 4¼-percent interest rate limit on new issues of marketable Government bonds having a maturity in excess of 5 years and the 3.26-percent limit on savings bonds. The issues involved are simple, yet fundamental. One does not have to be an economist to understand them. I propose to outline these issues and to answer some of the arguments made against the proposal. I shall do so in nontechnical terms.

Basically, what is at stake here is a further demonstration by the Congress that it intends to defend the value of the dollar, that it stands firmly opposed to countenancing inflation as a way of life, and that it has not succumbed and will not succumb to the centuries-old blandishment that true wealth can be created by printing money.

Now why is it necessary to reaffirm by a positive vote that this Congress is determined to defend the dollar? The reason stems from the unfortunate fact that an increasing number of people in this country and abroad are questioning the dollar's future value. They are aware of the depreciation of its purchasing power in recent years and are disconcerted by what they regard as the failure of Government to come to grips with inflationary factors. As a result something quite new in our history is taking shape, namely, a growing expectation of continuing inflation, creeping or otherwise.

This expectation of inflation, which affects saving, investment, and spending decisions, must be dispelled and the Congress is the only body able to do it. The proposal now before us is an opportunity to help do just that, and we should vote for it overwhelmingly.

The people of this country must have full confidence in the dollar if they are to save on the scale needed to finance high employment. Confidence in the dollar is essential if savings are to expand to the extent necessary to finance the economic growth that we all believe in. It is necessary if economic security for the American people is to become other than a mockery. Finally, unless we affirmatively stand for a sound dollar, we shall be inviting various economic controls, including wage controls, the loss of individual freedom, and possibly forced saving.

So this proposal, while it does not go all the way, is a constructive proposal. It is put forward because the administration and, I am confident, a majority of the Congress believes in these goals of high employment, economic growth, protection of the security of the people, and the preservation of individual liberty.

Just as a sound dollar is the keystone of our economic and financial structure, so also the credit of the U.S. Government is the keystone of all credit. Unless there is confidence that the securities issued by the U.S. Treasury will not only be paid back in full but will be paid back in dollars worth as much as the dollars originally invested in them, there can be and will be no confidence in the enduring values of any other credit instruments. Already there are signs on every hand that an increasing number of savers and investors are becoming mistrustful of bonds and other fixed income obligations and are seeking to hedge against inflation risks by buying common stocks, regardless of how high they may be, and investing in real estate and other forms of property. This flight from bonds is the same thing as a flight from the dollar.

It is unnecessary to remind the Senate that long-term fixed interest obligations in the form of bonds and mortgages are the main vehicles through which the savings of the country are channeled into homebuilding, farm improvements, business expansion, and modernization, as well as the financing of Federal, State, and local governments' projects. That is why it is so important, if we really believe in high employment, economic growth, and security, to restore full confidence in the dollars in which bonds and mortgages will be eventually repaid.

The tragic situation today is that the long-term bonds of the U.S. Government are no longer sought after by investors as the safest and most attractive investment available in the world. Yet they should be. To me it is ignominious that the Treasury of the richest and most powerful Nation in the world is literally in a position where it cannot sell any new securities with a maturity of over 5 years.

There are three simple reasons for this: The first is that the demand for savings to finance the Federal Government, State and local governments, home building, business, and agriculture now exceeds the available supply of new savings. This is typical of periods of active and expanding economic activity. When demand exceeds supply, prices always tend to rise; and interest rates, which represent the price of savings or capital, are no exception. Thus those seeking to borrow from the limited supply of savings must be willing and able to bid at competitive rates.

The second reason is that both at home and abroad people with money to invest are becoming increasingly fearful that inflation is inescapable in what Professor Sumner Slichter has called "a pressure group State." Consequently investors tend to demand an even higher interest rate as at least a partial offset to the expectation that they will be paid back in less valuable dollars. To quote Professor Slichter again, he wrote in the July 23, 1959 issue of the Commercial and Financial Chronicle:

One must concede that present long-term interest rates are not adequate compensation for the hazards of owning high-grade bonds.

Most of us were brought up to believe that good bonds are about the safest and most conservative form of investment. But now, because of the expectation of inflation, even men like Professor Slichter consider them hazardous.

Finally, the third reason is that 41 years ago, in 1918, under completely different circumstances, the Congress imposed a statutory limitation of 4¼ percent on Government bonds having a maturity in excess of five years. There is no need to remind this Congress that 41 years ago, when this interest rate ceiling was voted, all bonds of the U.S. Government were exempt from Federal income taxes whereas today all new issues of government securities are fully taxable. Furthermore, 41 years ago the Treasury was not competing against bonds issued under governmental credit programs backed by Federal insurance and guarantees. These latter bonds are a comparatively recent development, and they carry higher interest rates than straight Treasury obligations. The Congress should recognize these changes.

Before going into the reasons why I believe the interest rate straightjacket must eventually be removed so that the Treasury can sell long-term bonds, I should like to dispose of an argument that is frequently made against the proposal. It is said, "Why worry about inflation when there is no inflation?" Critics point to the fact that for the past several months two particular economic indices have been stable, namely, the cost of living index and the index of wholesale commodity prices. This was true up to 2 or 3 months ago, but it is too soon to decide whether the recent rise in these indexes represents a trend; but there is a rise. The same thing was true in the late 1920's. I seem to remember, however, that in 1929 there was a great inflation in the stock market, in real estate, in the use and abuse of credit and in the mistaken idea that we were in a new era. That inflation was followed by the worst depression in our history.

Those who would stand pat on the 4¼-percent interest ceiling also say that if there is any inflationary psychology or inflation fear abroad in the land today it is due to scare talk by the administration, the Federal Reserve Board, and various business interests. They could not be more mistaken. The inflationary fears that exist today are no new development. They have been with us a long time. Fourteen years ago, in 1945, President Truman stated, "Inflation is our greatest domestic problem." Again in 1947 he said, "Our chief worry is still inflation."

Inflation was with us then; it has been with us ever since, though in brief periods its manifestation in certain price levels has been temporarily dormant. Today's dollar is worth 38 percent less than in 1945 and 23 percent less than in 1947 when President Truman issued his two warnings. What we are proposing is to inoculate against this sickness of the dollar before another epidemic of price increases breaks out. Fear of inflation is a matter of daily comment in newspapers and magazines, and on radio and television. Reputable advisers are constantly telling investors that because of inflationary probabilities it is safer to speculate in the stock market and in real estate than to invest money in high-grade bonds, including the bonds of the U.S. Government. Is it not time to reverse the topsy-turvy conditions that cause advice such as this?

Why is it essential that the Treasury be free to compete in the marketplace in order to sell long-term bonds? I am not arguing that there is any particular merit in long-term bonds as such. What I do argue is that there are very grave risks, inflationary risks, in having too much of any debt structure in the form of very short term securities. Again the reasons are simple, and they are chiefly two.

The first risk applies to the Government just as it applies to any person or business that is in debt. If a debtor has more short-term obligations than he can pay off when they fall due, then he is in the unhappy position of being at the mercy of lenders who may not be in a position or may not desire to renew the loans. But if the borrower has so arranged his finances that the due dates on his debts are spread over a long period of time he can probably meet his periodical principal payments without undue strain. If he is not able to do so, he can probably refinance without difficulty because the sums involved in each maturity might be relatively small.

The second reason is that very short term Treasury securities such as those maturing within a year are virtually the equivalent of money. Owners can allow them to mature, or they can sell them in almost unlimited quantities, literally over the telephone and with virtually no risk that the transaction will result in a loss. Since interest is paid on short-term governments, it is little to be wondered that businesses and financial corporations consider such paper a superior medium for the temporary investment of any surplus funds they may have on hand. But when they need—and this is particularly true of businesses—to turn part of their temporary funds into additional inventories and receivables to finance a higher volume of business, or to invest in new plant and other improvements, the first thing they dispose of is their short-term Government issues. These conditions usually arise when business is at a high level after the early stages of recovery, as in 1956 and 1957. The liquidation of short-term Government paper by business corporations in those 2 years was not in the millions, but in the billions.

The trouble is that under such conditions there are not sufficient buyers outside of the commercial banking system to absorb the sales or to refinance maturing issues. Consequently, the commercial banks or the Federal Reserve, or a combination of the two become the residual buyers. They become the residual buyers because they, and they alone, have the power to create new credit. This increases the money supply at the very time that production is pressing against the limits of capacity and the upward pressure on prices and wages is already becoming evident even without the injection of additions to the supply of money. Nothing could be more inflationary. It is to minimize this danger that the Treasury must be given the tools to sell long-term bonds at interest rates that will attract investors.

If Congress could stop the clock, there would be less urgency to remove the interest rate ceiling. Unfortunately, Congress cannot stop the clock any more than Canute could stop the tides. Treasury obligations which today are due in 13 months will be due in 12 months a month from now and what is now due in a month will have to be paid off by refinancing. If, during the remainder of the present fiscal year, the Treasury is forced to finance entirely in bills, notes, and certificates due within a year, the short-term debt will have risen from its present figure of $76 billion to $100 billion. This would mean that the Treasury would be faced with the appalling task of refinancing an average of $2 billions every week.

Let me put it another way. Since short-term Government securities are purchased not for permanent or semi-permanent investment, but as a temporary alternative to cash, the Treasury and the Federal Reserve have at all times to recognize that they are relying on unreliable holders—that is, on owners who are here today but may be gone tomorrow. Thus, the Treasury's floating debt often becomes hot money that can be moved around at a moment's notice to be spent or invested as the owners see fit.

Up to now I have been talking about the internal inflationary risks of having the Treasury completely reliant on relatively short-term securities in its financing. Let me now turn to another area, namely, our position in international finance.

Until comparatively recently we did not have to pay too much attention to what foreigners might think about the stability and strength of the dollar. This is no longer the case. The leading industrial nations of the free world have not only recovered from the devastation of their productive capacities caused by the war, they have also restored their currencies. They have built up their holdings of gold. They have increased their short-term balances in this country from about $5 billions in 1947 to $17 billions, which is more than they need to transact their business here.

Thus, we are no longer in the uniquely sheltered position that prevailed during the earlier postwar years. On the contrary, we are a part of a community of nations composed of many countries that are highly productive, efficient, aggressive, and, more important, soundly financed.

The critics of the proposals before us seem to ignore these obvious facts. They appear to be under the illusion that we can safely dismiss the unpleasant prospect that foreigners are in a position to reduce their holdings of dollars very substantially and will probably do so if they lose confidence in the dollar's value as compared to gold or other currencies. We cannot trifle with this risk. If a foreign run of the dollar should ever start and gain momentum, the rug would be pulled from underneath our whole financial structure, for the base of that structure is built on our gold reserves. We are already losing large amounts of gold, largely because our merchandise exports are falling and our imports are rising. Let us not compound this problem by flirting with experiments in economic theory by following policies of loose fiscal management and easy money.

We must never forget that the industrial countries of Western Europe and Japan experienced severe inflations before restoring their currencies. They know all the devices to which governments resort when they attempt to disguise the symptoms of inflation without attacking the causes. One of the best known of these devices is to follow what seems to be the easy way to finance the government, namely, to rely almost exclusively on short-term debt issues especially if they are sold directly or indirectly to the commercial banks and the central banking system. These nations know this from experience. They also know that our Government, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and many others have consistently warned all nations of the dangers inherent in this method of financing.

I am not an alarmist. However, I do want to emphasize with all the power at my command that we must put and keep our financial house in order to avoid any possibility of a foreign exchange or gold crisis that might arise if foreigners started putting their money out of this country. There could be no greater catastrophe, not only to ourselves, but to the whole free world.

One of the arguments put forward against removing the 4¼ percent interest ceiling is that it will tend to push up all interest rates. What we need, if we are to foster economic growth and employment, it is said, is lower interest rates. One proposal to achieve this goal is to have the Federal Reserve buy long-term Government bonds and not confine itself, as has been its practice, to short-term Government issues. The inference is clear that if only the Federal Reserve would accommodate the Treasury in this way the prices of long-term bonds would rise, and interest rates would fall and thus there would be no reason to eliminate the 4¼-percent ceiling.

Well, we tried this device in the postwar period. Finally, in 1951, the policy had to be abandoned. It had to be abandoned because when owners of long-term Government bonds saw that prices were being supported at artificial levels they dumped their holdings on the Federal Reserve by the billions. Of course, they dumped them. Any sensible investor would when he could get an artificially high price and put the proceeds to work to better advantage. Today if the Federal Reserve were to embark on any such policy of artificial support and manipulation, there could be no stopping. It would be the greatest handout to the owners of long-term Government bonds, including the banks, that could possibly be imagined. I, for one, am against any such handout.

Not only would it be a handout, it would be highly inflationary and would be so interpreted both at home and abroad by all those who know the full implications of manipulated attempts to escape the disciplines of free and open markets. Once started, there would be no stopping. It would become like the farm program about which none of us, I am sure, is happy. The difficulty is that once one has started this type of artificial support operation it seems to become extremely difficult, if not impossible, to unscramble the eggs.

Let us suppose for a moment that technically it would be possible for the Federal Reserve to fix interest rates on Government securities and that it could do so without being forced to buy most of the long-term debt now held by private investors. How in a free country could it control all other interest rates, of which there are many? How could it prevent an investor from selling a long-term Government bond to the Federal Reserve at let us say 3½ percent and reinvesting the money in some other obligation at a higher rate or putting it into common stocks, real estate, foreign securities, or even spending it? Not even big government, not even the Federal Reserve, has the power or the resources to regulate what millions of investors and millions of borrowers are willing and able to do.

It could be argued also that if the 4¼ percent interest ceiling is removed all interest rates would rise. I don't believe anyone can make this prediction with any confidence. But there is one prediction that can be made with complete assurance. If the Congress fails to pass this bill and if it fails to pursue other anti-inflationary policies, there is no telling how high interest rates will go. And here again, the reason is very simple. As people become more convinced of the inflationary trend, the less willing they will be to save. Even more important, the less willing they will be to put what they do save into mortgages, bonds, and other fixed income obligations. As the supply of savings available for bonds and mortgages declined, so also would borrowers want to increase their borrowings because they would become convinced that they could pay off their debts in depreciated dollars. Inevitably declining supply and rising demand would force up interest rates. That has been the experience throughout the world whenever inflation has been tolerated.

Some people have tried to create the impression that an aye is a vote for those who favor high interest rates and is, therefore, a vote for further inflation. Of course, this is not the case. An aye vote is not a vote in favor of high interest rates; it is a vote which recognizes that relatively high interest rates now prevail because the demand for savings exceeds the supply.

It is, of course, true that interest represents a cost of doing business, but its importance has been greatly exaggerated. Since interest is deductible before paying Federal taxes, the net interest burden is only approximately 48 percent of the gross interest rate. Furthermore, long-term borrowing by business represents only a small part of the capital employed. For these two reasons, interest is one of the least important items of business expense. Tremendously more important is the increased volume of capital that is needed to finance business under inflationary conditions of rising costs of materials, supplies, and labor.

This is conspicuously true in the case of the burden of interest on home mortgages. The cost of building a typical ranch house, for example, has increased about 75 percent since 1940 due to the inflation of costs. This means that the prospective home owner must not only put up more cash as a downpayment but must also borrow more dollars if he wants to finance the same type of house he could have bought for 75 percent less only a few years ago. The burden of paying off the principal of this increased mortgage falls upon the homeowners after tax income and is far greater than any increased burden resulting from changes in interest rates paid out of earnings before taxes.

Now, finally, we have before us the proposed removal of the 3.26 percent interest ceiling permitted on savings bonds. When savings bonds were first conceived as an investment for people of modest means, bought usually on regular savings of small amounts through payroll deductions and other plans, they were by far the most attractive savings medium. They carried a higher rate of interest than was available elsewhere, they could be cashed at any time without loss, and they had many other advantages. These conditions no longer apply. The rates at 3.6 percent aren't competitively attractive and Congress has not yet done all it can to assure that the bonds can be redeemed without loss of purchasing power. How can we in good conscience urge the average citizen to buy these bonds?

Quite aside from the moral involved, there is a very practical aspect. The people of this country have decided, in the aggregate, that presently available savings bonds are overpriced. In the past 2 months alone the public has redeemed $736 millions more bonds than it has purchased. This has obviously added to the Treasury's refinancing problems.

The Treasury's problem can and will be solved. Of this I am confident. The first and basic step is to eliminate any cause of fear as to the future of the dollar. Fear of continuing deficits, even in times of active business, high employment, and large profits, must not only be removed but Congress and the administration must continually aim for substantial budgetary surpluses in good times. A confinement of expenditures and appropriations to items having the highest priority would help more than anything else to produce the surpluses needed to reduce the Government debt. This, in turn, would release funds for investment in further economic growth and would be a powerful influence in reducing interest rates.

In addition, sooner or later the Treasury must be given the necessary tools with which to finance the debt soundly. The Treasury must be able to offer competitive rates in all maturities of its financing and refinancing. It must be able to avoid the inflationary danger of becoming almost totally reliant on short-term issues, which are the practical equivalent of money. All of this would also bolster foreign confidence in the dollar. Finally, the Treasury should be able to offer to the citizens of this country through savings bonds, the finest and safest securities in the world; and for them our citizens should be willing to pay a fair rate of interest. It is for these reasons that the proposals now before us are of such vital importance.

Mr. President, we are going to have an opportunity at this time to handle this part of the problem.

As I said when I began these remarks, although I believe this bill does not go as far as it must go sooner or later, I am going to support the bill in the form in which it came from the committee; and I shall oppose any amendments.

In these remarks I have purposely confined my comments to some of the principal issues. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the pending bill to eliminate the interest rate ceiling is a constructive proposal. It is designed to foster economic growth, high employment, and the protection of the dollar. A vote in opposition to removal of the interest ceiling sooner or later will be a vote in favor of more inflation, will provide further support for inflationary psychology, further weakening the confidence of investors in mortgages and bonds, and will increase the appetite for common stocks and other property regarded as inflationary hedges. Failure to remove the interest rate ceiling will pose the risk of large gold outflows, with serious consequences for the United States and the entire free world. Last, but by no means least, failure to enact this bill will be a deterrent to savings. These savings are vitally needed to finance the capital investment which is a fundamental prerequisite for sustainable economic growth.

Mr. President, this concludes my formal statement.

I should like to offer for the RECORD—and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks—a statement made by Marriner S. Eccles, published on August 2, 1959. Mr. Eccles was once Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and he has long been regarded as an important authority in this field.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INFLATION CURBS RAISE INTEREST—SO BONDS DRAG

(By Marriner S. Eccles)

There seems to be a general lack of understanding of the economic factors which determine the interest rate. It is thought by many, including some influential congressional leaders, that the Federal Reserve can control interest rates while at the same time maintaining stable money, which is its primary objective.

The Federal Reserve can influence the growth in the supply of money as well as restrict it.

To permit an expansion greater than the growth in the national product under present conditions, would have the effect of diminishing the purchasing power of the dollar. This is inflation and if allowed to continue will lead to ever-increasing interest rates.

Under boom conditions—when the supply of money is held in check to prevent inflation—the demand for credit exceeds the supply, and interest rates are bid up. Such is the present situation.

You cannot have low interest rates in a booming economy without bringing about a dangerous inflationary situation. Only an economy in a state of declining activity produces an excess in the supply of money and credit and hence lower interest rates.

Of course, the Government can control interest rates temporarily, as during the war when it controlled everything else—wages, prices and so on—but when such controls are taken off, and the excess supply of money released, inflation is inevitable.

A large part of the postwar price inflation was a result of the Federal Reserve purchasing billions of dollars of Government securities at fixed prices in order to prevent an increase in interest rates. This was during the period when the Government had a balanced cash budget.

The Treasury and White House, over the strong protest of the Federal Reserve, required this action be taken.

The result was that an excess amount of bank reserves was created which brought about an inflationary expansion of commercial bank credit and of the money supply.

The present administration and the Federal Reserve are trying to avoid making this mistake by curbing the growth of bank credit and allowing the interest rate to rise.

Under present conditions the aggregate savings by individuals and business are inadequate to meet private investment demands and at the same time finance the large public deficit of the States and Federal Government. Hence we find interest rates going up, even though there is a growth in the money supply equal to the growth in the national product, at stable prices.

There is no effective substitute for larger savings combined with curbs in public spending as a means of preventing inflation and increasing interest rates.

It is a fallacious idea to think that the bankers control this situation and are greatly benefited by high interest rates. On the contrary, this condition causes the banks to pay increasing interest rates for savings deposits and time funds and depreciates the value of mortgages and bonds held in large amounts by the banking system.

At present, this offsets any benefits arising from increased interest rates.

The real beneficaries of the higher interest rates will be the millions of people who put their money in savings accounts in banks and building and loan companies, or those who purchase bonds and mortgages at the present high interest rates. In short, the savers.

The need is for Congress to deal with the causes of the higher interest rate, rather than to oppose an increase. The Government cannot expect to keep interest rates from rising as long as it has to finance a large budgetary deficit in times of prosperity.

The effect of this deficit under present conditions is inflationary and tends to discourage savings on the part of the public and to increase the need for credit.

A statement I made last March before the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report bears repeating. It is this:

"I want to say again, that to achieve our objectives will always be a source of great political and economical controversy because everyone wants a greater share of the economic pie than it contains.

"Government and other public bodies want more money to spend; the leaders of organized labor want more pay and fringe benefits for less hours of work; business presses for further profits; and increasing ranks of oldsters call for higher pensions.

"However, everyone expects these benefits in dollars of stable purchasing power.

"Unfortunately, all the economy has to divide are the goods and services it is able to produce—and not the amount of money it could create, which is, of course, limitless.

"In our society, this situation is creating a dilemma for the Members of Congress whose constituents want easy money, lower prices, higher wages, greater profits, and fewer taxes.

"Only a combination of the Government, Congress, and the Federal Reserve can successfully deal with these diverse forces. To do this adequately it would be necessary for them to agree on the problems and have the courage to act, regardless of political conditions."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President——

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, at this time I am happy to yield to my friend, the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in my own time.

However, the question I was going to ask the Senator from Utah is whether it is a fact that in ordinary business, a person who becomes involved financially usually has imposed upon him, when he goes to borrow, the need to borrow on a short-term obligation.

Mr. BENNETT. That is entirely true. The Senator from Ohio will remember that in 1928 and 1929, that situation reached the point where people were loaning call money at 12 percent, in order to maintain the terrific inflation. And certainly it is impossible to get money any shorter than that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In 1932 and 1933, I was on the common pleas bench; and I had coming through my courtroom the foreclosures on chattel mortgages, conditional sales agreements, and notes. I saw the frequency with which the debtor was saddled with short-term and, frequently, demand obligations.

I think we can expect that, whenever a person is in financial involvement—either as an individual or a businessman—and when he goes to borrow money. The lender usually expects a demand obligation or a short-term obligation.

I ask the Senator from Utah to express an opinion on that subject.

Mr. BENNETT. I have been a borrower, both personally and for business purposes, over the years; and I know there is nothing more difficult to face than the realization that the man who is lending you money is not willing to extend your note to the extent you hoped he would, or if he serves notice on you that he expects to be paid the next time the note becomes due.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not also a fact that the nations of the world that finally have suffered economic collapse through a breakdown of the stability of their currency have found that one of the last steps preceding the collapse was the effort to keep themselves alive by short-term borrowings?

Mr. BENNETT. When inflation gets really blazing, I think everything related to currency and money is found to be in a short-term situation. I have heard it said that toward the end of the German inflation of the 1920's, the German people insisted on being paid twice a day, because if they did not spend their morning earnings by the time night came, by the next day much of the value of what they had earned would have dissipated.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BENNETT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Utah for yielding to me. I shall detain him only briefly.

This morning, I asked the chairman of the committee—and now I ask the Senator from Utah, for whom I have the greatest respect; and I serve with him on the Banking and Currency Committee, and I know he is a man of great competence—whether there is any justification for what seems to me to be the real issue in regard to the Anderson amendment, namely, whether there should be a statutory limitation of some kind on the interest on savings bonds, or whether there should be no limitation whatsoever.

Can the Senator from Utah justify the proposal to remove entirely the limitation, as contrasted with the Anderson amendment, which, as I understand, would provide a great deal of flexibility, but would provide a limit of 4½ percent.

Mr. BENNETT. I am sure the Senator from New Mexico expects to discuss that point at great length.

I should like to make just one comment on it: The Treasury has announced that it expects to issue these bonds—if given permission to do so—at 3¾ percent. But I think if the limit were imposed at 4¼ percent, in the face of the present general market conditions, in which the interest rates are very fluid, and people expect them to continue to rise, I would be inclined to say, "Well, they have a 4¼-percent limit, so that is where they are really expected to go, and they will stop when they reach that point. So I think I will wait until the interest on the bonds is changed from 4¼ to 4¾ percent."

Therefore, for that psychological reason, I do not believe it would be wise to do that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Does the Senator from Utah mean that if there is any limit, he would prefer a 3¾-percent limit to a 4¼-percent limit?

Mr. BENNETT. I would prefer no limit at all; and I expect to support the action taken by the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield to me, let me say that the limit permissible under the bill is 100 percent. Does the Senator from Utah think that point would be reached?

Mr. BENNETT. I do not understand exactly the interrogation of the Senator from Mew Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Utah said he thought the ceiling would rise from 3¾ percent to 4¼ percent. But under the bill, an increase of 100 percent would be possible.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not think that is the limit; there might be a 1,000-percent increase.

Mr. ANDERSON. In fact, could not it continue to infinity?

Mr. BENNETT. I think that, psychologically, people react to specific things; and when there is no limit, people are willing to follow the changes which occur normally in the market.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would the Senator from Utah relate that to the present 4¼-percent ceiling; and will he name one bond now at 4¼ percent that comes under the 4¼-percent limitation?

Mr. BENNETT. I am not prepared at the moment to give such an example.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course not, because there is no such example.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the Senator on a very fine speech with regard to the problems of financing our debt structure at the present time. The Secretary of the Treasury and the President have stressed certain proposals which they feel are necessary in order to carry out a proper funding of the national debt. We are probably going to meet today some of the necessities in the bill before us, but I share the views of the Senator from Utah that it will be only a matter of time before we shall have to approach this problem on a proper basis and deal with the entire bond market, instead of with only the E- and H-bonds.

It is interesting to note that even out in the country, so to speak, this problem is being thought about. I have an editorial from a newspaper in a small town in western Kansas. I read one or two paragraphs from that editorial:

> Paradoxically, the only way out of the Treasury's plight is through the removal of all controls on interest rates for Federal financing. This might result in unprecedently high interest rates temporarily. But only for a little while.
> Supply and demand again would come into play. The high rates would so discourage private borrowing of every sort that soon there would be a surplus of investment funds. That in itself would begin to force interest rates back down.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the entire editorial made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS FORCES HIGHER INTEREST RATES

> The odds are that in the near future if you want to borrow money to build a home, buy a new car, or refinance an old loan, you will have to pay a higher rate of interest. If you do, you can properly blame Congress.
> The majority in Congress suffers from the delusion it can hold interest rates down by law. It has refused the request by the administration that present ceilings on the rate the Government can pay on longtime loans be raised. In so doing it is forcing up all interest rates.
> This week the Treasury had to pay 3.8 percent to obtain 91-day loans, the highest since the bank holiday. The 4¼-percent ceiling today makes it impossible for the Government to borrow on a long-term basis. So increasingly it must do its refinancing through short-term borrowings.
> Supply and demand have superseded congressional controls. The requirements of the Government are so great in proportion to the short-term funds available, the rates will go on up.
> Paradoxically, the only way out of the Treasury's plight is through the removal of all controls on interest rates for Federal financing. This might result in unprecedently high interest rates temporarily. But only for a little while.
> Supply and demand again would come into play. The high rates would so discourage private borrowing of every sort that soon there would be a surplus of investment funds. That in itself would begin to force interest back down.

Mr. CARLSON. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. I thank my friend and fellow member of the committee for his very fine observations.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. First I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from Utah upon his splendid presentation this afternoon. It is one of the best speeches on this subject I have ever heard. It is quite in keeping with his usual thoroughness in dealing with such serious matters.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] without losing my right to the floor. The Senator from Ohio has an engagement and has asked me to do this. I should like to do it without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Connecticut for yielding to me.

We are asking the citizenry of our country to buy E and H savings bonds at an interest rate far below the rate which they may receive from bonds of municipalities, State governments, and private corporations. I believe that that expectation is wrong and that therefore we must raise the interest rate on E- and H-bonds.

I want, however, to direct my remarks to what I believe is a very deplorable situation existing in the method in which our Government bonds are held. My comparison will be of the holdings in 1946 compared with the holdings in 1959.

I have chosen the year 1946 because it was at that time, generally, that the holdings were at their highest point following World War II.

In 1946 there were $279 billion worth of bonds outstanding. In May 1959 there were $286 billion, $7 billion more than there were in 1946.

One lesson that is to be learned from those figures is that, although we were supposed to have had unprecedented prosperity between 1946 and 1959, we have not reduced the debt, but the debt has gone up. I humbly submit that good government, good husbandry, and good economic practices demanded that in the period of prosperity that debt should have been reduced.

What were the holdings in 1946? What are they in 1959? Which segment of the economy has remained firm, unselfish, devoted, and patriotic toward its Government, and which segments have failed in their responsibility? These figures to me are shocking.

Commercial banks, in 1946, had $93 billion worth of bonds. In 1959 they have $63 billion. They unloaded bonds in the sum of $30 billion. I suppose they unloaded their bond holdings and invested their money in mortgages which bring a higher rate of interest, and enjoy the guarantee of repayment made by the Federal Government. The banks reduced their holdings by 30 percent.

I now come to the insurance companies. In 1946 the insurance companies had $24 billion in Government bonds. In 1959 they have $12 billion. They got rid of $12 billion worth of bonds in the last 13 years.

So the commercial banks have dumped $30 billion and the insurance companies $12 billion worth of bonds in the last 13 years.

Now we come to the third segment of the economy that dumped its bonds, and that is the mutual savings banks.

They held $11 billion worth of bonds in 1946, and they now hold $7 billion worth of bonds. They have gotten rid of $4 billion worth of bonds, and I suppose they are investing their money in mortgages, getting a higher rate of interest, and also enjoying the guarantee of the Government in the loans which they make.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. My time is limited. I shall gladly yield if the Senator will offer me a bit more time.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I do not control the time. I asked unanimous consent to yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Ohio. If I may have another 5 minutes on that same basis, I shall be glad to request it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, is there any limitation of time on the bill?

Mr. BUSH. There is no limitation of time. I asked unanimous consent that I might yield 5 minutes, without losing the floor, to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who had an engagement.

I ask unanimous consent to have another 5 minutes on the same basis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CARLSON. Does the information from which the Senator from Ohio is reading show the holdings of tax-exempt securities held by the commercial banks, insurance companies, and mutual savings banks?

Mr. LAUSCHE. It does not.

Let us go to the other side of the coin. Which segments of the economy have been faithful and devoted to their Government? I look at the column dealing with the holdings of Government bonds by individuals—that is, holdings of E- and H-bonds.

This shows that in 1946 the individuals of our Nation held $64 billion worth of bonds, and they now hold $65 billion worth.

There is another column dealing with the holdings of State and local governments. In 1946, the State and local governments held $6.7 billion worth of bonds, and they now hold $18.2 billion worth, an increase of some $12 billion.

There is a third class of investors; that is, the trust foundations and others. They increased their holdings of bonds by $9 billion.

Mr. President, the point I am trying to make is that the commercial banks, the insurance companies, and the mutual savings banks have reduced their holdings of bonds by $46 billion in the last 12 years. The individual, with a soul, kept buying the Government bonds.

I think the Senate is justified in asking the insurance companies, "Why have you $12 billion less worth of bonds in your portfolio in 1959 than you had in 1946?"

We are justified in asking the commercial banks, "Why have you $30 billion less worth of bonds in your portfolio in 1959 than you had in 1946?"

The banks may answer, "We were asked to divest ourselves of our holdings because, when we hold bonds, we can turn them in to the Federal Reserve and convert them into cash."

But the insurance companies can give no such answer.

In the last 6 or 8 months, the individuals have begun to sell their bonds. I can understand why. If an individual is told that the commercial banks, the insurance companies, and the mutual savings and loan companies do not want Government bonds, why should the individual, as an ordinary person, want to buy those bonds?

I submit to my colleagues that in this question there should be a consideration which supervenes the cold profit of the dollar. There is in it the patriotic responsibility not only of the individual but also of the banks, insurance companies, and mutual savings banks.

Hail to the individual of our country. He has had faith in his Government. He has increased his bond holdings.

I can look with nothing but contempt upon those commercial institutions which, solely for the purpose of making profit, have divested themselves of their bond holdings.

Finally I say to those companies, "If you expect to continue coldly in your business approach, beware, the day may come when by your own conduct you will destroy the structure from which your great profits grew."

I have been reading from the Treasury bulletin of August 1959, and the statistics which I have quoted are shown on page 53 of that document. There is no question about their correctness. These institutions which have divested themselves of their Government bond holdings owe an explanation to the public for their seemingly mercenary action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] asked me to yield to him for 5 minutes. If I may do so without losing my right to the floor, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have sought the floor at this time because some time ago I made a proposal in a Senate speech for the inauguration on the part of the United States of a campaign to sell peace bonds in lieu of savings bonds, with a higher interest rate and a special issue which would appeal to the patriotism of Americans, as well as to their instincts for thrift.

Mr. President, it seems to me that everything which has happened so far endorses that idea, fortifies it, and almost mandates it upon the administration. In the first place, the effort to take the interest rate ceiling off the long-term Treasury bond issues, or even to raise that ceiling, we see has come to naught. The only thing we are left with, in the bill before us, is the effort to take the ceiling off the interest rate on savings bonds, which is exactly what I was talking about.

Secondly, Mr. President, it has now become clear that the real hope for taking the pressure off the long-term bond market is to make the savings bonds salable and to make them stay put. The attrition—the excess of redemptions over sales—which is now at a new high of $150 million a month, is causing the worst possible reflection upon the long-term Treasury bond issues. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the experts—I shall refer to those in a minute—this is having a very serious effect on the long-term Treasury bond market.

For all those reasons it is time we took this action. It is time we passed a bill of exactly this character in the effort to alleviate our situation by the savings bond route. That is the most anti-inflationary kind of bond issue, because the money for the bonds comes right out of the savings of the people, the classical source of addition of capital, whether to a private business or to Government business, which is what we are talking about. It also represents for the people who invest, the deprivation of certain aspects of consumables, which is again an anti-inflationary aspect. Finally, it is a sure way in which to make the money stay put. The money is not used to increase bank reserves. It does not go right back into the credit stream. On the contrary, it stays put with the individual in the finest possible way.

My colleague from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] has added to the idea of the peace bond issue his idea of the interest rate structure, which would have an optimum rate of 4 percent, graduating up to the optimum based upon a scale, in the same way the savings bonds are handled today. I believe the 4-percent rate is a competitive rate.

So, Mr. President, though it is not necessary to write a single thing into the proposed legislation, I rise to express not the hope but the expectation that the Treasury Department will realize the proper way to accomplish what we desire is to take advantage of the enormous patriotic instinct in the country, which evidences itself in a desire of the people to put up their money for peace rather than for war. I expect the Treasury Department to offer the people a $25 billion issue of peace bonds under the new interest rate structure as developed by my colleague from Delaware, about which he will speak himself, and which will be permitted under the provisions of the bill.

I trust the administration will not be lead-footed, Mr. President, and simply go on in the same old way, only increasing the interest rate a little bit but going on with the same old program. We have to do something new which will have a material impact upon the whole field of Government financing.

Mr. President, to bear out what I say, first as to the fact that the Treasury Department understands very clearly it has to raise the interest rate, I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury dated August 18, 1959, in which he says:

> Unless we are able to offer a rate on savings bonds which will permit the Treasury to reasonably compete in the market, the particular form the savings bonds campaign takes will be of little avail.

Of course, I agree with that statement; but, Mr. President, I have an earlier letter from the Secretary, of July 10, 1959, in which the Secretary said:

> We have found it takes an enormous amount of effort to enlist a volunteer organization year after year to maintain the vitality of the savings bond program. After sounding out some of our more influential volunteers, we are forced to the conclusion that we could not sufficiently dramatize the theme of "peace bonds' 'in such a manner as to bring about any substantial increase in volunteer effort, at least in the absence of a critical national emergency.

Mr. President, I ask the Secretary of the Treasury: How serious a national emergency does he want? Does he expect that we will have a national emergency only when we are in some kind of war? Is not this national emergency enough when long-term Government issues are discountable at rates up to 19 percent, when Government bonds cannot be sold in the open market at any kind of interest rates to which we are accustomed in the traditional American way, and when we are embroiled in many parts of the world in situations which verge upon war, and some of which have already erupted, as in Laos, into war?

Mr. President, may I have an additional 5 minutes?

Mr. BUSH. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I hope to be through sooner than that.

It seems to me that we are in a very grave national emergency, and that it takes new ways to do things. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] and I have suggested a new, important, and strategic way in which to proceed, one which will gain the great support of the American people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks certain excerpts from the statement of Secretary Anderson on public debt management, made by him before the House Ways and Means Committee in his testimony on June 10, 1959, bearing out the general thesis which I have just mentioned.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT ON PUBLIC DEBT MANAGEMENT BY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ROBERT B. ANDERSON BEFORE THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE, JUNE 10, 1959

The savings bond program is a program that every American has a right to be proud of. It puts more of the public debt in the hands of long-term investors—few people realize that the average dollar invested in these bonds stays with the Treasury approximately 7 years.

* * * * *

Furthermore, unlike savings accounts, where rates may move either up or down from year to year, the Treasury guarantees whatever rate of interest it puts on the bond for the full term of that bond.

Americans also know that savings bonds are perfectly safe; the Treasury has replaced over a million of them which have been lost or destroyed since the program began. These are attributes of savings bonds which have not changed over the years, quite apart from the relative attractiveness of the interest rate.

CURRENT SAVINGS BOND TRENDS

Sales of series E and H bonds improved slightly from 1957 to 1958 but were still behind sales for 1955 and 1956. Redemptions in 1958 declined significantly from the 1957 peak. But the 1959 record to date has not been good. Sales for the first 5 months are 6 percent behind a year ago, with a worsening trend. Similarly, 1959 redemptions through May are 9 percent above a year ago, also with a worsening trend. The amount of E- and H-bonds outstanding (including accumulated interest on E-bonds) declined by $36 million in April and May—a greater decline than in any 2-month period since the autumn of 1950.

* * * * *

The rate of interest return on E- and H-bonds is now much less favorable in comparison with savings accounts, as well as with other types of securities—both Government and private—than in earlier years.

* * * * *

Two of the three features in the new program—a higher rate on new bonds being sold and an improved extension term for bonds reaching maturity—follow the same pattern as in earlier savings bond revisions. You will note that we would like to make these changes effective as of June 1, 1959—regardless of when the legislation is approved—so that purchasers will know it is unwise to stop buying bonds on the false grounds that by waiting they could buy a better bond.

The other feature of our savings bond program is new and although it is rather completely described in the attachment to which I have been referring, I want to call it particularly to your attention.

We feel quite strongly that the Government has an obligation to the millions of Americans who hold E- and H-bonds to improve the future earnings of bonds already outstanding. We plan no additional interest on holdings of savings bonds for any period in the past. But we do feel that each holder of an outstanding bond is entitled to an increase of approximately one-half percent per annum on the future earnings of his bond if he holds it to maturity just as we are planning to pay one-half of 1 percent more to the buyers of new bonds.

Thus, present holders of E- and H-bonds would have little or no incentive to cash present bonds and buy new ones. Such switching operations would be costly both to the investor and to the Treasury.

* * * * *

The Treasury can borrow more economically through the proposed increase in savings bond terms at the present time than it can by borrowing through marketable securities. We believe, therefore, that the net addition to next year's budget costs for interest on the public debt because of the new savings bond program may be less than $10 million, and could quite conceivably result in no net increase in all. It is realized, of course, that the gross cost on savings bonds will tend to build up in later years, but the saving in comparison with alternative borrowing would very likely continue to be a sizable offset.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to conclude with the following facts. I wrote to the principal Government bond dealers in the United States upon this subject. There are 17 of them. I have up to this time, received 10 replies from the 17 to whom I wrote.

These replies are from some of the leading banking and financial houses in the country, as well as leading dealers in Government securities.

Mr. President, I should like in each case—and I shall not be lengthy—to read an excerpt from the letters from these great financial houses, showing how right we are in the idea of making savings bonds more merchantable and showing also how very important it is that the Treasury shall go one step further and have the initiative and the drive to do this in the way which will make the bonds more salable, through the peace bond effort, whether we call it by the name "peace bond" or some other name.

The fact must be flagged that the American people have a new opportunity to save at a better interest rate, and under better terms and conditions, in the patriotic interest of the country, which is so urgently required.

Salomon Bros. & Hutzler, one of the great banking houses, in their letter of September 2, states:

Such an issue would in no way adversely affect the market for marketable Government bonds and would, in my opinion, if it offered a sufficient rate of return, attract additional savings from small individual savers.

The New York Hanseatic Corp. states:

As dealers in Treasury issues we cannot visualize anything but favorable reaction to your effort as it would concern the Government bond market.

The First National Bank of Chicago, in their letter of September 4, 1959, states:

In my judgment, the market would react favorably to a savings bond drive, to sell Government bonds to individual savers at an attractive rate.

They also state:

With no immediate signs of a downturn in interest rates we may presumably expect a continued attrition in savings bonds holdings in the months to come unless the interest rate is raised.

Briggs, Schaedle & Co., of New York, an outstanding house, says:

May I take this opportunity to suggest to you and the members of the committee on which you serve that in my opinion it would be a very sound action if the committee would recommend and Congress would pass legislation which would allow the Treasury to sell Government bonds at higher than a 4¼-percent interest rate.

From Aubrey G. Lanston & Co., under date of August 28, 1959:

Bold new steps are needed to stem this attrition. In addition, at times of business strength such as now prevails, it would be highly desirable, in our judgment, to increase the amount of individual savings flowing into Treasury securities.

The Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co., of Chicago, in its letter of September 3, 1959, says:

We certainly share with you and your colleagues a strong desire to do everything possible to improve the sales of U.S. savings bonds to individuals.

William E. Pollock & Co., another one of the houses dealing in this kind of security, says that they believe that the matter should be permitted to await later economic conditions. They are the only one who registered an adverse reaction. They were not enthusiastic about the idea of selling these savings bonds now.

The Morgan Guaranty Trust Co., one of the great financial institutions of the United States, in their letter of September 3, 1959, state:

By the nature of the current savings bond operation, where a great majority of the purchases come through the payroll deduction plan, I feel that an increase in the effective rate of return to 4 percent would go a long way toward stopping attrition and continuing in force such payroll deduction operations.

Mr. President, may I have just 1 more minute?

Mr. BUSH. I, too, have an engagement. I yielded to the Senator for 5 minutes. It has now been about 20 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe it has been only 10.

Mr. BUSH. I will yield 1 more minute by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORSE. Delighted. Delighted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. JAVITS. The First Boston Corporation states:

> In answer to your direct question concerning the possible market reaction to a "peace bond campaign," we believe that any revision in terms which provides a fair and competitive rate for savings bonds would strengthen the overall program; cut down attrition and, perhaps, even increase the amount of savings type securities outstanding.

Finally, C. J. Devine & Co., another one of the large houses dealing with these securities, says:

> As you may recall, during the war many slogans were developed for the purpose of selling savings bonds in order to raise substantial sums of money. If that were true then, the idea of a "peace bond" is one that each and everyone of us should be anxious to participate in now.

Mr. President, this is the most important opinion available. I express the hope that together with my friend and colleague, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], we may inspire the Treasury to use this bill in the way it really should be used, in this imaginative and active way, to sell peace bonds to the people of the United States.

I thank my colleague from Connecticut for being so patient.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I address myself this afternoon to an amendment which I prepared and which is at the desk, but which I shall not call up at the present time.

The purpose of the amendment is solely to remove the ceiling on interest rates from the long-term open-market securities of the Treasury, as well as the ceiling on interest rates on savings bonds.

Mr. President, I do not intend to ask for a vote on this amendment, for 3 principal reasons: First, I fear from what I have heard from my friends on the committee that calling up an amendment of this kind might result in a flood of amendments which would, according to advices I have had, imperil the whole bill. This I do not want to do, since I think a quarter of a loaf is probably better than none. Second, I know that the votes exist to defeat this amendment. Third, Mr. President, I feel just as sure as I am standing here on the Senate floor today that Senators who would vote against this amendment today will have to reverse their positions within 12 months, and I do not want to put a hurdle in their way because Senators do find it difficult to reverse their positions from time to time. I know what that means, and I do not wish to make it difficult for them.

If I thought this amendment had a good chance to pass, I would bring it up, but I have counted noses very carefully and I believe that it has no chance of passage at this time. I say that with a great deal of regret because I think it is a most important amendment. It deals with a most important subject.

To me it is fantastic that the Senate should be sitting here at this crucial time in the financial history of our Government, in this crucial time in the history of the world, when the whole free world is dependent upon the United States and upon the credit of the United States, and be insisting that the Treasury try to finance this great operation with one hand tied behind its back.

To me the situation is absolutely fantastic.

First, I wish to invite attention to a statement made by the President of the United States on August 25, when he said:

> I would like to make two things absolutely clear:
> First, the administration is willing to assume full responsibility for managing the Federal Government's debt if it is allowed to do so free from artificial restrictions and on a parity with other borrowers.
> Second, if the requested legislation is not enacted, those in the Congress who are unwilling to pass it must assume full responsibility for the possibly serious consequences.

Those are the points I emphasize this afternoon.

First, this administration is ready to take full responsibility for managing the public debt if we do not tie one hand behind its back.

Secondly, in refusing to give the administration the necessary authority to do so in an orderly fashion, Congress must assume the responsibility, which is a very heavy one, and which I feel will bring deep regret to many Members of this body before another 12 months have passed.

I assume that we are to proceed with a high rate of business activity, with industrial activity, once the steel strike is over, gaining new high levels, in which direction it is headed.

President Eisenhower also said on that day:

> The vital interests of all Americans are at stake because excessive reliance on short-term financing can have grave consequences for the purchasing power of the dollar.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire statement of the call of the President of the United States for congressional action to remove the artificial limitation in the interest rate on long-term Government bonds be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S CALL FOR CONGRESSIONAL ACTION TO REMOVE INFLATIONARY INTEREST-RATE CEILING ON LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT BONDS

To the Congress of the United States:

On June 8 I transmitted to Congress a message requesting legislation that would (1) remove the artificial limitation which the law now imposes on the interest rate at which the Treasury is allowed to borrow money for more than 5 years, and (2) remove a similar limitation on the rate the Government can pay on savings bonds.

Last week the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives voted to suspend consideration of these proposals for the remainder of this session. This action was a grave disappointment to me.

The American people have a tremendous stake in this proposed legislation. Failure to enact it means that—

Millions of thrifty Americans cannot be fairly treated, since the Treasury will be unable to pay a fair rate of interest on savings bonds;

The cost of living may rise further, as the Treasury will be forced to manage our $290 billion debt in a way that adds to pressure on prices;

Responsible people at home and abroad can only conclude that we have not yet determined to manage our financial affairs as soundly as we should.

I would like to make two things absolutely clear:

First, the administration is willing to assume full responsibility for managing the Federal Government's debt if it is allowed to do so free from artificial restrictions and on a parity with other borrowers.

Second, if the requested legislation is not enacted, those in the Congress who are unwilling to pass it must assume full responsibility for the possibly serious consequences.

This country's outstanding public debt of almost $290 billion is held by our citizens and financial institutions, and by foreign central banks and investors who have accumulated dollars as part of their reserves.

Each investor has his own investment requirements. He buys different kinds of securities in order to meet those needs. Common to all investors, however, is the requirement that the rate of interest paid on the securities be fair and equitable in the light of other investment opportunities and, secondly, that the purchasing power of their invested dollars will not be impaired.

These considerations apply directly to the way in which the Government handles its debt.

There can be no question as to the Government's obligation to deal fairly and justly with the millions of its citizens who invest a portion of their savings, sometimes as a patriotic duty, in Government bonds. And there should be no question as to our determination to manage our debt soundly and in the best interests of all of the people.

We have worked tirelessly for a balanced budget. We need this balance so that we can avoid the deficits that lead to higher prices, to a rising cost of living, and to an eating away of the value of the billions of dollars that thrifty and farsighted Americans have saved. But congressional inaction on our debt-management proposal could do much to offset the progress we have made toward fiscal responsibility.

To manage the public debt in a sound manner the Treasury must be able to borrow money for long as well as short periods of time. A 1918 statute now prescribes, however, that we cannot pay more than 4¼ percent for long-term money. So long as the present prosperity contributes to a strong demand for credit, and thus keeps the cost of new long-term borrowing higher than 4¼ percent, we will not be able to borrow for periods longer than 5 years.

Let me suggest one simple parallel to show why the Treasury should be able to borrow for longer periods. Suppose that an individual had a mortgage on his home that had to be renewed every few months. He would be exposed to every shift in the economy and to every change in financial conditions. Yet, the Congress in effect is forcing the Treasury into this type of exposed position. It is saying to the Treasury, "When you have any borrowing to do, do it all on a short-term basis."

Within the next 12 months the Government must borrow $85 billion to cover maturing securities, redemptions, and seasonal cash needs. This Government, with its great financial resources, can normally carry a sizable amount of short-term debt. But it cannot afford to rely exclusively on borrowing that must be continually renewed. Yet, if the Congress insists that we continue to finance wholly with short-term securities, the whole $290 billion debt will grow shorter and shorter. This will make it even harder to handle in the future.

The vital interests of all Americans are at stake because excessive reliance on short-term financing can have grave consequences for the purchasing power of the dollar.

The issuance of a large amount of short-term Treasury debt would have an effect not greatly different from the issuance of new money. Because these securities are soon to be paid off, their holders can treat them much like ready cash. Moreover short-term securities are more likely to become lodged in commercial banks. When a commercial bank acquires a million dollars of Government securities, bank deposits rise by a million dollars. This is the same as a million-dollar increase in the money supply. When the money supply builds up too rapidly relative to production, inflation is the result. The piling up of an excessive amount of short-term debt poses a serious threat that may generate both the fear and the fact of future inflation at an unforeseeable time.

Now, while the Nation is enjoying a period of rapid economic advancement, we want to keep the cost of living steady. And, if we act wisely, we should be able to do so. We must live within our means and we must exercise all the necessary precautions in the use of credit.

We have made good progress toward preventing excessive Government spending. But we may fail in our efforts to keep prices from rising if we do not handle our debt in the proper way. This is why the Treasury must have the capacity to finance the Government's requirements in free credit markets without artificial restrictions.

The need for sound debt management stems not only from domestic considerations. Foreign investors have substantial holdings of our securities, as well as other claims on this Nation. With so large a financial stake in our economy, these foreign central banks and other foreign investors have a very practical interest in the manner in which we handle our affairs. It is essential that they, too, continue to view the American dollar as a strong and stable currency. In a free market economy, confidence is not the simple result of legislation. It is earned by adherence to sound practices.

Let me state as plainly as I can that this is not legislation to increase interest rates. This administration is not in favor of high interest rates. We always seek to borrow as cheaply as we can without resorting to unsound practices.

The Treasury already has the authority to borrow at any rates of interest on obligations up to 5 years. What we are seeking is the authority, already possessed by all other borrowers, to obtain funds for longer periods as well. To prohibit the Treasury from paying the market price for long-term money is just as impracticable as telling the Defense Department that it cannot pay the fair market price for a piece of equipment. The result would be the same in either case: The Government could not get what it needs.

The need for congressional action with respect to the existing 3.26-percent interest rate ceiling on savings bonds is equally pressing.

The Government occupies a dual trusteeship position with respect to the 40 million Americans who own savings bonds and the 8 million people who purchase them regularly. The average holder looks to the Government for a fair rate of return, reasonably competitive with other savings opportunities. The Treasury has announced that when the ceiling is removed, it will immediately raise the rate from 3.25 percent to 3.75 percent on all newly issued E- and H-bonds, if held to maturity. Whenever legislation is enacted, this rate increase will be made retroactive to June 1, 1959. In addition, the future return to the investor on savings bonds purchased before June 1 and held to maturity would be increased by one-half of 1 percent. These actions would result in fair and equitable rates of return on savings bonds.

The second part of the trusteeship relationship of the Government with respect to holders of savings bonds involves the purchasing power of the dollars invested in the bonds. The savings bond holder expects the Government to try to insure that the future value of his savings will not be eaten away by progressive erosion of the dollar. To help assure that the value of the dollar will be protected, the whole debt management proposal should be enacted.

Each of these trusteeship considerations is vital; the thrifty American is entitled to both.

The issue with respect to our legislative proposals is whether we are going to demonstrate responsibility in the management of our Federal debt.

Ours is the richest economy in the world. We have a large public debt, but we can certainly handle it soundly and efficiently if we remove the artificial obstacles to borrowing competitively in the free market. By adopting the administration's proposals, the Congress would be demonstrating to people at home and abroad that we have the determination to preserve our financial integrity and to protect our currency.

No issue of greater importance has come before this session of Congress. In the best interests of the American people, I urge the Congress to enact the administration's proposals at this session.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 25, 1959.

Mr. BUSH. I also invite attention to a statement by the Secretary of the Treasury, who said, on September 3:

The entire debt management legislation requested by the President almost 3 months ago is even more important today than when first presented. The responsibility for the consequences which could occur if the full proposal is not enacted would have to rest with those who opposed it.

He also said:

Although the present measure provides needed relief for savings bonds purchasers and holders and makes certain technical improvements, we shall continue to urge that the ceiling on the marketable debt be removed in order that the Government may act most prudently in managing the debt, so as to maintain confidence both at home and abroad in our determination to handle our financial affairs soundly.

That is part of what the Secretary said on that day. In a recent interview which he had with the editors of the U.S. News & World Report Secretary Anderson was asked this question:

Are interest rates really high today compared with the past, and compared with the rates in other countries?

He replied:

Of course, if you look back, interest rates were very low during the 1930's, because there was little demand for money. During the war, most of the activities in this country were under direct controls and many people were buying Government securities—and Government securities were held at pegged prices, because we were at war.

We had a short spell after the war in which we were operating most of our economy with relative freedom, but during most of that period we still had a peg on Government securities. Then we had Korea.

So it has really been only since the Korean conflict ended and we had negotiated the Treasury-Federal Reserve accord of 1951, that there has been a relatively free market.

Now, interest rates in Canada are higher than they are here in the United States. Their rate on 3-month borrowing is now over 6 percent. In fact, our rates are lower in the United States than in any other advanced industrial nation where credit markets are free.

This summer I looked into the rates on government bonds and long-term government bond yields. The most recent tabulation I have is for July. While most of the items are as of July, some of the rates appear to be for May and June of this year. I believe none of them go back further than May of this year.

I ask unanimous consent that the table be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, to show the relative rate of interest in the long-term bond market in other countries.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Long-term bond yields

	Percent
United States (July)	4.11
Canada (July)	5.05
Belgium (July)	4.27
Denmark (July)	5.34
France (May)	4.31
Italy (June)	5.33
Netherlands (July)	4.12
Norway (May)	4.55
Portugal (May)	3.01
Sweden (July)	4.24
Switzerland (July)	3.17
United Kingdom (June)	4.83
Australia (July)	4.91
New Zealand (June)	4.92
Union of South Africa (June)	5.25

Mr. BUSH. The press of the country has become increasingly interested in the question of bond interest rates. It has been interesting to me to review some of the editorial opinion which has appeared recently respecting this very important issue. I have before me several editorials from which I shall read brief excerpts, but I ask unanimous consent that at the close of my remarks these editorials be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorials may be printed in the RECORD as requested.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BUSH. The Washington Evening Star recently said:

The Congress will be guilty of dangerous imprudence and irresponsibility if it fails to take action on President Eisenhower's recommendation, repeated in a special message this week, that authority be given for removing the statutory ceiling on Treasury bond interest rates and for raising the rate payable on savings bonds.

* * * * *

This issue of interest rates has been made a political football on Capitol Hill. It is time for the responsible leadership of Congress to demonstrate its understanding and its interest in a matter of major importance to the national welfare.

I am afraid that is right. I am afraid the interest rate question has become a political football.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch is not known to be an exceedingly conservative newspaper, and that is a well-controlled statement. However, it is very much concerned about this issue. Recently it commented in part as follows:

Although we often disagree with Representative RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania, top Republican on the committee—

The House Ways and Means Committee—in this case he is right in describing the committee action as "incredible folly." As he observes, the Government will be forced to borrow in the short-term money market in competition with State and local governments, business, and consumers. This is likely to force upward the cost of short-term money, and to inflate the supply of credit.

The same editorial says:

The 14 Democrats who voted to suspend action for this session on the legislation must know they voted against "economic growth." The Treasury should be enabled to compete with other borrowers in the money market. The discarded compromise bill would have permitted it to do so for 3 years, a reasonable period.

The author of the measure, Democratic Representative HARRISON, of Virginia, joined the 10 committee Republicans in voting for the bill. It is too bad he could not have persuaded two additional Democrats to join him.

The New York Herald Tribune recently dealt with this subject. An editorial appearing therein stated:

Sound management of the Nation's $290 billion debt is one of the pillars of fiscal stability and is impossible without long term borrowing.

Long-term debt cannot be managed without the ability to borrow in the long-term market.

Within the next 12 months the Treasury will have to borrow $85 billion to cover maturing securities, redemptions and seasonal cash needs. Unless Congress acts, this will have to be done without access to long-term funds. Speaker RAYBURN knows this. Senator JOHNSON knows it. It's up to them to put politics aside, and act promptly to free the Treasury from artificial and fiscally dangerous restrictions.

The New York Times is not exactly the most conservative paper in the country. I find my friends across the aisle frequently quoting editorials from the Times on various subjects. On this particular subject the Times has been very much exercised lately and has printed several editorials. In one which I have asked to insert in the RECORD the Times said, in part, as follows:

The existing ceilings applying to interest rates on Government bonds must be removed or liberalized.

It adds:

Savings bonds outstanding total $50.5 billion. That figure exceeds by $2 billion the total of all publicly held marketable issues of the U.S. Treasury with maturities of 5 years or longer. Every dollar that is withdrawn by a savings bond holder is a dollar that the Treasury will have to replace, and that, so long as present interest limitations remain in effect, it will have to replace by raising the money through methods highly inflationary.

So much for the New York Times.

I have an editorial from the Rockford Morning Star, the title of which is interesting: "In Fiscal Fog." I shall quote only a brief paragraph:

This embarrassment to the Treasury Department has been patiently pointed out to Congress by both the President and Secretary Anderson. And it is, indeed, more than an embarrassment; it is a fiscal peril. But Congress, still befogged by the old shibboleth of cheap interest, merely shrugs its shoulder, and, like Micawber, waits for something to turn up.

In Wichita, Kans., there is a paper called the Wichita Eagle, an editorial from which I have asked to have inserted in the RECORD at the close of my remarks. I shall read only the last paragraph:

Congress either will act to meet the Treasury's pressing need for longer term, noninflationary borrowing or it will be called back to reconsider. Getting the national debt on a more manageable basis is of the utmost concern to the future of every citizen.

In Louisville, the famous Courier-Journal is very much concerned about this matter. An editorial on the subject, in which their position is summarized, was published on Tuesday, August 25, 1959. I shall read only from the end of the editorial:

In short, Uncle Sam is at disadvantage when he goes to the money market, and is compelled to resort to devices costly to the taxpayers.

The Democrats may not be moved by the serious difficulty in which the present interest rate ceilings put Treasury Secretary Anderson. But they have given up hope that the next Treasury Secretary may be one of their own?

Finally, the Register-Republic, of Rockford, Ill., comments on the subject in an editorial entitled "Everyone Affected," the closing words of which are as follows:

If the Treasury cannot borrow more money on a long-term basis, it will not pay as much interest in the aggregate as it would by having to issue notes frequently for 90-day and 180-day periods. The fight for reasonable interest rates is thus of importance to every individual and not merely to investors who lend money to the Government.

The New York Times of last Sunday published in its financial section a very interesting article written by Paul Heffernan. The article is entitled: "Money Managers Hit a Roadblock—Treasury Is Forced Back Into Short-Term Market for New Borrowing, But the Sale of Bonds With Long Maturities Is Barred by Interest Ceiling."

I shall read the first paragraph of Mr. Heffernan's article:

If a man made $7,000 a year and owed about $29,000, of which $5,000 was payable on demand and $7,500 more within a year, he would know what it's like to be Uncle Sam. The difference is seven zeros at the end of the dollar sign.

This article discloses the very serious situation in which the Treasury finds itself.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed following the editorial of which I have spoken, at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, again, from the New York Times of Sunday, September 6, 1959, I read from an article written by the economic writer, Edwin L. Dale, Jr. The article is entitled: "Big Trade Deficit Is Sparking Move To Cut Aid Funds—U.S. Worried by Decrease in Gold Stockpile and Rise in Foreign Assets Here." Mr. Dale says:

Powerful voices, centering in financial agencies, have begun to argue that the flow of Government capital abroad in the form of aid is too large for the continued strength of the dollar.

Further in his article, Mr. Dale states:

The other—

is a growing fear for the future stability of the dollar unless two related things happen: domestic finances are controlled and the balance of international transactions is righted.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article published in the New York Times be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on Monday, September 7, 1959, the Washington Post and Times Herald published an article on this subject written by Harold B. Dorsey. The newspapers are all very much concerned about what is happening. The title of the article is "Legislators Hurt Those They Profess To Protect."

I believe that is exactly what we are doing. I do not mean to say there is any deliberate attempt on the part of Senators on either side of the aisle to hurt anybody. I know very well there is not. I simply think that some Senators who support his dangerous policy of artificially controlling interest rates do so thinking they are protecting somebody. But Mr. Dorsey, I believe, very correctly points out that what we are really doing is to hurt the very people whom it is sought to protect. In his article, he said, in part:

There can be little doubt that the failure of Congress to pass legislation that would permit more flexibility to the Treasury Department in its financial operations is closely associated with the rising interest rates.

Later, in his closing paragraph, he says:

The wierd part of this whole thing is that the suffering is most serious for the millions of people whom these Congressmen profess to be protecting, while it is helping the profits of the comparatively few for whom numerous Congressmen have frequently expressed criticism—the bankers. Even the latter realize that they will ultimately suffer by the distress that is being imposed on all of the others.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article by Mr. Dorsey be printed at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 4.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, finally I call attention to an editorial entitled "How Bond Rates Affect You," published in a recent issue of Life magazine. The article reads, in part:

Nobody in his right mind thinks that Congress would ever imperil the national defense by refusing to pay the Pentagon's bills. And if it did so there would be such an outburst of indignation that Congress would get cracking.

But the reverse of this is happening. The management of the public debt is also of vital concern. Yet Congress is refusing to give the Treasury the powers it needs to manage the public debt in a sound and orderly way. There has been no outburst of public indignation because the issue is difficult for laymen to grasp.

They had better grasp it, for it affects the value of their savings and the security of their future. By its failure to act, Congress is driving up interest rates and adding to inflationary pressures.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 5.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, in the Joint Economic Committee we have had before us various witnesses who have commented on this subject. One of them was Paul Samuelson, a very distinguished economist from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I believe it has been said of Professor Samuelson that his ideas are frequently associated with those of the so-called liberal wing of the Democratic Party. That information I have by hearsay, but from a good authority.

However, Professor Samuelson is very much concerned about the restrictions upon long-term interest rates.

Here is what he said before the Joint Economic Committee, this year; and now I quote from page 208 of the hearings beginning on January 27, 1959:

Good management of the economy might make it desirable for the Government to issue long-term bonds at just the time that interest rates are hardening and existing bonds are falling in price. In the interest of stability it may become necessary for Congress to repeal the maximum rate now payable on Government bonds, I believe now set at 4¼ percent. Such maximums, like similar maximums set on FHA or VA loans and like overall limits set on the public debt, do, in the opinion of most economists, more harm than they do good, and I would recommend their repeal.

A little later in his testimony, the following occurred, when Professor Samuelson was asked a question by my dear friend, Representative PATMAN:

Don't you think that our interest burden has become so excessive that we should give serious consideration to ways and means of lowering it, Professor Samuelson?

Mr. SAMUELSON. Let me say that the reason why I advocate the removing of that limit is precisely because in the whole postwar period there has been an upward trend in interest rates; and that limit is now getting to a point where it is no longer ineffectual. When it becomes effectual I think it is going to become harmful. We are going to have all the subterfuges of accounting that we have seen on the public debt limit, we are going to repeat the history of centuries of usury laws which, in the interest of making it better for the poor man, actually made it tougher for him to get money.

I think the Government is going to have this same particular problem. I might have a different opinion from you about structural changes in our whole banking system, but at least I could see where such structural changes might accomplish a useful purpose, whereas the fiat of a maximum interest rate, I think, is going to get into our own way and cause more and more trouble.

Finally, Mr. President, I wish to quote another authority whose testimony I believe will be of interest to the Senate. I refer now to the testimony of Dr. Wilhelm Vocke, formerly the president of the Bank Deutscher Länder, now the Deutsche Bundesbank, the Central Bank of the Federal Republic of Germany. I ask unanimous consent that the article by Dr. Vocke be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 6.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, at this time I wish to call attention to several of the statements which Dr. Vocke made.

In speaking of the German experience after World War II, he said:

There are perhaps two principal lessons to be learned from the German experience. The first is that currency stability can be achieved and preserved even under the most adverse circumstances. The second, and even more significant, is that a monetary policy, firmly committed to currency stability, not only does not conflict with a high rate of economic growth but indeed is essential to its achievement. Germany's remarkable economic recovery and expansion over the past decade was closely linked to the restoration and preservation of a strong and stable monetary unit.

He also said:

This experience—

In other words, the German experience—proves that a central bank must be persistent and unruffled in its pursuit of a determined course of action, and must not shrink from occasionally taking unpopular measures if its obligations and responsibilities to the Nation are to be properly fulfilled.

Mr. President, that is exactly what the Federal Reserve Board of this country has been doing. It has been persistent and unruffled in its pursuit of a determined course of action, and it has not shrunk from occasionally taking unpopular measures, if its obligations and responsibilities to the Nation require it to do so.

Dr. Vocke also spoke on the subject of the creeping inflation thesis, as follows:

To a foreigner it seems almost absurd that there should be certain quarters in the United States where inflation is tolerated or even recommended. Surely any price to be paid for inflation must be excessive, considering not only the adverse economic and social effects, but the irretrievable losses in national prestige it may entail. The path of inflation in the United States would not only mean the depreciation and ultimate devaluation of the dollar, but also an acute decline in the moral authority, power, and international stature of the United States.

Mr. President, that is a rather stern warning. We cannot afford any decline in the moral authority of our people and of our Government or in the international stature of the United States, in this day and age when the freedom of the entire free world and the security of the entire free world depend upon the strength of our Government, which is heavily dependent, as we know, upon the credit of the Government of the United States.

Dr. Vocke also said:

Moreover, even if a limited depreciation of the dollar is envisaged, the public will try to protect itself, and by doing so will inevitably accelerate the pace of the price rise. Stability of the rate of inflation is an illusion, for if the public knows there will be a creeping inflation of 2 percent per annum, then the 2 percent will be reached not at the end of the year, but at the beginning, and the pressure for inflation will mount.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to make one more quotation from this German authority. Germany has been through this situation since World War II. In fact, Germany has been through it two or three times during my lifetime. Dr. Vocke also said:

And today, foreign central banks alone hold almost $10 billion here as part of their international reserves. These substantial holdings reflect the confidence of the world in the strength and stability of the U.S. dollar. One should hasten to note, however, that this faith in the dollar is by no means unshakable, and developments affecting its future are closely watched abroad.

Mr. President, some of my friends have said we should not call attention to this situation; they have said it is dangerous to do so, and that the reason why bond prices have gone down is that we have been discussing the dangers involved in this issue.

Mr. President, so far as our foreign friends who have these tremendous commitments in our country are concerned, the central banks and other investors have, together, approximately $17 billion invested in this country, subject to withdrawal on short notice—which means that the gold supply in this country could be reduced by $17 billion if they ever decided to do so.

There is concern as to whether we should discuss this issue or not. In fact, I think they are probably encouraged by the fact that we are discussing it and that at least some of us see the danger involved. What would disturb them more than anything else would be for us to go merrily along the inflationary course and not do anything about it. That would disturb them.

Mr. President, they cannot be fooled. We cannot fool the heads of these central banks. We cannot fool the Treasury heads in European countries. They know what fiscal management means. They have to have proper fiscal management in their own countries. They have to know how to do it. As a matter of fact, they have men in those responsible positions who are fully as skillful bankers and fully as skillful in handling fiscal matters as we have in the United States. So I reject the thesis that this is a subject which we should not discuss. In fact, I think it should be well ventilated, and that is the reason why I have discussed my amendment today.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was trying to learn what the purpose of the quotation from the German banker was. He said, as I understood, that there should be no place in the United States where inflation was to be tolerated. Is he speaking out of the long experience they have had in Germany, where they have constantly tolerated inflation? How does the German banker become an expert for us?

Mr. BUSH. He is the former head of the Central Bank.

Mr. ANDERSON. He knows what Germany has done in round after round of inflation.

Mr. BUSH. He knows what has happened in Germany and, like the heads of other European central banks, he knows what goes on in Europe and around the world.

Mr. ANDERSON. If his advice is so good, why did he not take it at home?

Mr. BUSH. He did take it at home.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thought the Senator just got through saying that in his own lifetime he has known of four inflationary periods in Germany.

Mr. BUSH. I did not say four.

Mr. ANDERSON. How many?

Mr. BUSH. Two or three. I go back to the 1920's.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why did he not take his own advice?

Mr. BUSH. He was not in the saddle at that time.

Mr. ANDERSON. He was working at that time, was he not?

Mr. BUSH. I do not know.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is quoting him.

Mr. BUSH. I know what he has been doing. He is the former head of the Central Bank.

Mr. ANDERSON. How old is he?

Mr. BUSH. I do not know what his age is. He is old enough to be very wise. He would not have been head of the Central Bank of Germany, under Mr. Adenauer, if he were not mature.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator referred to a quotation "even as low as a 2-percent inflation." Have we averaged 2 percent inflation every year of the Eisenhower administration?

Mr. BUSH. What I am saying——

Mr. ANDERSON. Have we?

Mr. BUSH. I am not answering that question. I am simply saying this man points out the danger. He sees it from his post as head of the Central Bank, and knows that we cannot have creeping inflation without its being dangerous.

Mr. ANDERSON. Have we not had it?

Mr. BUSH. And we are in trouble as the result of it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. Yes. That is exactly right.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. BUSH. I would like the Senator to bear with me. I have quite a long speech. If, when I finish, the Senator wishes to question me, I shall be delighted to answer. I think the Senator realizes I have never avoided an opportunity or an invitation to debate this question on the Senate floor. I do not wish to appear to be doing that, but I do have a lot to say. I have been waiting for a long time to say it. I beg my friend to indulge me for that reason. I yielded to my friend from New Mexico when my voice was about to give out.

I yield now to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Only for an inquiry do I ask the Senator to yield. How long will it take the Senator to complete his address?

Mr. BUSH. I hope to complete it by 5 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BUSH. That is not a firm commitment, I may say to my good friend. It is a hope I wish to attain.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator have available a copy of his address?

Mr. BUSH. No, I do not; I am sorry. I did not have time to put it in finished form.

CHANGES IN THE INVESTMENT MARKETS SINCE THE CEILING WAS ESTABLISHED

Mr. President, the 4¼-percent ceiling on Treasury obligations having a maturity in excess of 5 years was established during World War I, in the law authorizing the Third Liberty Loan. It was incorporated also in the Fourth Liberty Loan Act, and has remained on the statute books. Since that time, some far-reaching changes have taken place which have reduced the ability of the Treasury to compete in the investment markets and which necessitate a readjustment in this ceiling.

When the 4¼-percent ceiling was established, interest on U.S. Government obligations was in large part exempt from taxation by the Federal Government. Subsequently, such interest was made more completely taxable, and in 1942 tax exemption was eliminated for new issues of Treasury obligations, with the result that interest earned on Government securities by individuals, corporations, and other taxpayers—except nonprofit institutions, and so forth, since they are already exempt from Federal taxation—is now subject to taxation by the Federal Government.

The elimination of tax exemption has greatly reduced the attractiveness of Government obligations, in comparison with other outlets available to investors, particularly to individuals.

Income on State and local government obligations is exempt from taxation by the Federal Government, giving these bodies a tremendous advantage over the Treasury in attracting funds.

The Treasury must, as a result of the elimination of tax exemption, compete on a competitive interest return basis with such other borrowers as business corporations, owners of real estate, and the like.

The Treasury has been forced to compete with itself in the capital markets: the credit of the U.S. Government has been pledged to secure, through insurance or guarantee, billions of dollars of obligations issued by a great variety of borrowers, including farmers, homeowners, businessmen, shipowners, and so forth.

At the end of the fiscal year 1959, the amount of insured and guaranteed obligations outstanding was some $55 billion.

Furthermore, and this is crucial, obligations being insured or guaranteed currently all carry interest rates higher than the 4¼-percent ceiling placed upon Treasury bonds, except for $3 billion of local housing bonds which are guaranteed and tax exempt.

As a consequence, investors prefer to purchase insured and guaranteed obligations, and the market for Treasury securities has been correspondingly impaired. Commonsense would dictate that the Treasury should be permitted to pay on its own direct obligations rates comparable with those which it is forced to underwrite through insurance or guarantee operations.

The United States, or at least the financial community, is fearful of a continued erosion in the purchasing power of the dollar. Two results are apparent: First, investors have been shifting their funds into common stocks, real estate, equities in real property, or other investment media which they believe will give some protection against a steady rise in the price level; and, second, in cases in which they have continued to invest in debt obligations, they have insisted upon obtaining an increase in the rates in order to have some protection against the loss in the purchasing power of the dollar.

A comparable situation did not prevail at the time when the 4¼-percent ceiling was imposed. Investors did not then fear, as they do today, an upward trend in the price level.

This inflation fear means that the Treasury must pay higher rates on its borrowings than otherwise would be necessary.

Investors cannot be forced to buy debt obligations; they must be attracted by the yield obtainable.

Any developments that weaken inflationary expectations will help ease the problems of all borrowers; developments that strengthen inflationary fears will make the task of borrowing funds more difficult and make for higher interest rates.

Removal of the Treasury interest rate ceiling would help reduce inflationary expectations.

INTEREST RATES—PRESENT LEVELS

The present levels of interest rates are the result of basic forces operating in the economy; neither the Federal Reserve nor the Treasury desires high interest rates. Efforts to maintain artifically low interest rates will mean increased inflationary pressures in the economy.

Mr. President, interest rates fluctuate with conditions in the economy, rising in periods of expanding business and declining in periods of business slack. This has been the case in the United States for the past century and more; it is also the case in other developed economies, such as the Western European countries.

This coincidence in the movements of business activity and interest rates is evident in the financial history of the United States in years when the Treasury was not an important factor in the credit markets and before the Federal Reserve System was established.

The experience of the United States with interest rates in the postwar years has been essentially no different from what it was in earlier periods of fluctuating business activity.

High interest rates are not an invention of the Treasury or the Federal Reserve; they are the result of the large demands for credit pressing against a limited supply of savings.

FACTORS CONTRIBUTING TO RECENT RISE OF INTEREST RATES

The factors that have contributed to the rise of interest rates that began about mid-1958 include the following:

The business upturn. Signs of recovery began to appear in the second quarter of 1958 and were confirmed soon after midyear. The recovery of the economy has been both vigorous and broadly based.

The upturn in business activity brought with it the prospect of larger demands for credit, especially since it became evident about a year ago that the Treasury would be required to finance a very large deficit in the fiscal year 1959.

These expectations of large credit demands have been validated. The Treasury, State and local governments, homeowners, and individuals all have been demanding very large amounts of credit. Corporate demands have been fairly modest so far in the business expansion, but rising inventories and plant programs and larger tax payments give promise of large credit demands in the future.

Beginning about mid-1958 there occurred a resurgence of inflationary psychology in the financial markets. As a consequence, some savings institutions and organizations shifted a larger proportion of their funds into common stocks; others, which continued to invest in debt obligations, attempted to get protection against the prospect of an upward trend of prices by asking for higher rates and for greater protection against early refunding if interest rates should move down.

The 1957 and 1958 recession did not result in any significant contraction in loans of the commercial banks: In every month of 1958, loans were higher than in the corresponding month of 1957. Since mid-1958, bank loans have been rising sharply. This means that the banking system is in a relatively tightly loaned position.

FEDERAL RESERVE AND THE RECENT RISE OF INTEREST RATES

The Federal Reserve System is not responsible for the upward course of interest rates since mid-1958.

During the business recession of 1957 and 1958, the Federal Reserve followed an easy credit policy which permitted a sharp rise in the money supply and in the holding of liquid assets in the economy, and which contributed to sharp declines in all classes of interest rates.

Such an easy credit policy may be appropriate in a recession, but it is highly undesirable in a period of rapid business expansion such as that which has been underway since the second quarter of 1958.

In the period of expanding business, the Federal Reserve has not reduced the volume of reserves available to the banking system. The active money supply—demand deposits adjusted and currency outside the banks—rose by about 4 percent between mid-1958 and mid-1959.

The total of loans and investments of commercial banks—a measure of the amount of credit made available by the commercial banks—at mid-1959 was 3 percent higher than in mid-1958.

The upward pressure on interest rates reflects the sharply increased demands associated with business expansion and a huge Treasury deficit. Interest rates have increased despite an increase in the total amount of credit provided by the commercial banks.

TREASURY AND INTEREST RATES

In this period of business recovery and heavy demands for credit, the Treasury was forced to finance a deficit of $12½ billion in the last fiscal year. Due in part at least to the interest rate ceiling, this financing was concentrated in maturities under 5 years, and the result was an especially strong upward pressure on interest rates for these maturities.

The Treasury obviously does not like to pay high rates on its financing. But in the light of the conditions prevailing in the economy, there was no alternative, unless the highly inflationary technique of financing the debt through the banking system had been adopted.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE, INTEREST RATES AND THE MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. President, it is argued that the Federal Reserve has contributed to the present high level of interest rates, since its credit policies have prevented the money supply from growing in line with the growth of the economy. The contention is made that the money supply should be permitted to grow at the rate of 3 to 4 percent a year. It is assumed that a more rapid rise in money supply would contribute to lower levels of interest rates.

That argument is fallacious, Mr. President, for these reasons:

First. The money supply has been no deterrent to economic growth. During the past decade the money supply has increased by an average of 2½ percent a year, even though there was hyperliquidity in the economy at the end of the war due to war financing. That the money supply has been more than adequate to finance real growth is indicated by the fact that the gross national product in real terms—constant dollars—has risen by about 3 percent a year over the past decade and the Consumer Price Index has risen by about 2 percent a year over the same period.

Second. The Federal Reserve has attempted to limit the rate of growth in the money supply in periods of business expansion and high level activity when the rate of turnover of the money supply has been rising. On the other hand, it has facilitated a rapid rise in the money supply in periods of business slack. Even in the past year, a period of rapid economic expansion, the money supply rose by 4 percent.

Third. The idea that the money supply should grow by a fixed amount or a fixed percentage each year would mean giving up the contribution that flexible credit policy can make to economic stabilization.

It would mean feeding a business expansion with the attendant risks of adding to inflationary pressures and boom psychology.

It would mean the economy would lose the advantage of a rapid increase in money supply in a period of economic slack.

Fourth. It is extremely doubtful whether a more rapid increase in the money supply would mean lower interest rates; in fact, it probably would mean just the reverse.

Absence of credit restraint in a business expansion would contribute to inflationary expectations and to inflationary pressures, and these would mean larger demands for credit and increased reluctance to invest in debt obligations, both of which would contribute to upward pressure on interest rates.

Fifth. The problem at the present time is not an inadequate money supply but rather a surplus of highly liquid assets—deposits and short-term obligations—in the hands of the public.

TREASURY RELIANCE UPON SHORT-TERM FINANCING

The argument is advanced that the Treasury does not need to lengthen the debt; it can do its financing through the issuance of shorter-term obligations to which the present interest ceiling does not apply.

Again, the argument is fallacious. Comment as follows:

ABOUT THE COST OF SHORT-TERM BORROWING

First. In appraising this argument, it should be pointed out that recently the Treasury has found it necessary to pay an interest cost well above the 4¼-percent ceiling for financing through shorter term issues. Thus, concentration of financing in maturities not subject to the 4¼-percent ceiling could mean higher, not lower, current carrying cost on the debt.

Second. It should also be pointed out that the average maturity of the outstanding Treasury debt is constantly being shortened by the passage of time. At present, some $75 billion of the marketable debt has a maturity of 1 year or less. If interim financing is limited to issues of a maturity of 1 year or less, by the end of 1960 the volume of these maturities would increase to nearly $100 billion, even without any increases in the marketable debt.

Third. Reliance by the Treasury upon the use of short-term obligations builds up the holdings of liquid assets in the economy and increases the inflationary potential in the economy. Holders of short-term issues can obtain access to cash by allowing issues to mature and demanding cash instead of accepting the exchange offering.

Any bank, Mr. President, will accept a short-term Government obligation maturing in a few days or in a few weeks. That is exactly like cash to a bank. A person can walk in with that kind of an obligation and walk out with the money.

The use of short-term financing increases the necessity of relying upon the commercial banks to provide a market for Treasury obligations. Financing though the banking system means an increase in the money supply, with an attendant increase in the inflationary potential.

Business corporations have been large buyers of short-term Government obligations in recent months. However, with outlays on plant and equipment, inventory accumulation and tax payments all rising, corporations are not likely to continue to be important buyers; in fact, they will probably eventually become sellers, as they have in other business expansions.

Reliance upon bank financing requires that the Federal Reserve make reserves available to the banking system. It is impossible to prevent some leakage of these reserves into an expansion of bank loans—thus further adding to business or consumer demands in the market place.

Fourth. Reliance upon short-term issues means a corresponding increase in the amount and frequency of Treasury refinancing operations, an increase in attrition—turn-ins for cash—on maturing issues, interference with the conduct of a necessary and desirable contracyclical credit policy, and enhanced disturbance in the capital markets due to the frequency and size of Treasury financing operations.

Fifth. The prospect that the Treasury will be forced to rely upon short-term financing certainly would add to inflationary expectations in the United States and abroad. It would be interpreted as a move in the direction of inflation. It would further impair the confidence of investors in fixed-interest obligations—thus further complicating the financing problem of the Treasury. It would contribute to further questioning of the prospects for the dollar on the part of foreign holders of dollar assets—and increase the risk of a run on the dollar.

INFLATION DANGER

Let us consider the inflation danger. The argument is that for more than a year, the price level has been approximately stable. It is argued that this shows that inflationary pressures are under control and that there is very little risk of a resurgence of prices.

This is another fallacious argument, Mr. President. My comment upon it is as follows:

First. The stability in such aggregate measures as the wholesale price index and the Consumer Price Index is due to the declines in the prices of farm and food products.

Prices of industrial products and services have been rising steadily.

If farm and food prices stop declining—and prices of some important agricultural products are now close to support levels—the result would be increased upward pressure on the price indexes.

Second. Customarily and traditionally, the upward pressures on prices become greater as the business expansion proceeds.

In the early stages of business recovery, prices are held down by idle plant capacity and rapid increases in efficiency and profits due to higher levels of output.

As the business expansion proceeds, however, these deterrents to price increases diminish in effectiveness and the tempo of price advances is stepped up.

Third. It follows that a policy of credit restraint becomes increasingly necessary as business expansion proceeds, in order to avoid a rapid increase in credit that would add to the upward pressure on prices.

Fourth. Inflation can take place in sectors of the economy that are not measured in the customary price indexes, notably in common stocks and real estate.

INFLATION PSYCHOLOGY

Let us consider inflation psychology for a moment.

I assert the failure to remove the existing ceiling on Treasury bond financing will be widely interpreted as a vote in the Congress for more inflation. This will undermine still further the confidence of investors in mortgages and bonds and increase their appetites for common stocks, real estate and other assets that are regarded as inflation hedges.

A vote to remove the interest rate ceiling, on the other hand, would be interpreted as evidence of the willingness of Congress to support action that is necessary to cope with inflation. This will facilitate the flow of savings into mortgages and bonds.

The factors that have contributed to the resurgence of inflation psychology in recent months include the following:

The failure of many prices and the comprehensive price indexes to show any decline in the 1957 and 1958 recession.

The continuation of wage increases in excess of gains in productivity, in the face of business recession and increased unemployment. This has given support to the belief that the wage-cost-price spiral will continue to operate, and that continued wage increases in excess of gains in productivity underwrite rising prices.

The huge deficit in fiscal 1959, in the face of only a moderate and short decline in business activity. Some months ago there was also the threat of huge new spending programs and the resulting prospect of continuing large deficits in the years ahead.

Continued criticism of the Treasury for its policies of debt management and of the Federal Reserve for the policies of credit restraint which it followed in the 1955 and 1957 business boom. The fear is that the pressure for easy credit and low interest rates will add to inflationary pressures in the future.

EVIDENCE OF INFLATION PSYCHOLOGY

Mr. President, there is ample evidence that inflationary psychology has been at work in the financial markets in a vigorous fashion since about the middle of 1958:

Prices of equities and real property have risen sharply in the past year or more. Contributing to these price increases is the underlying fear, shared by many people, that over the years the price level will continue to rise.

Excesses in such areas as common stocks and real estate have resulted in great problems and difficulties in the past, and can in the future, unless the underlying inflationary psychology can be curbed.

Action to restrain inflationary pressures must be taken before a vigorous upward trend in prices becomes evident.

Delay increases the problem of applying effective restraint and poses the prospect that harsher measures may be required ultimately.

The inflationary risk is increased by the large amount of liquid assets in the economy; the volume of liquid assets has risen sharply during the past year. Both the money supply and the volume of short-term Government securities—which holders can convert into cash by allowing them to mature—have risen sharply during the past year of business expansion.

This high liquidity constitutes a serious inflationary potential.

Removing the ceiling on Treasury bond financing, by increasing the scope for Treasury debt management functions, would enable the Treasury to do more financing in longer maturities, thus avoiding making further additions to liquid assets in the economy.

Economic services and stock market letters have been replete with discussion of the inflationary outlook, and the general point of view is that inflation is unavoidable.

The problem of coping with the inflation problem has been emphasized by many college professors and other students of the subject.

Mr. President, I have been listening to them one after another, in the Joint Economic Committee. We have had a great many of them before us, and we shall have more before the year is out. However, the majority of them—I believe about three out of four of them—are afraid of the inflationary problem, and they do not believe that a little inflation is a good thing. Three out of four of them say that price stability is desirable and an essential condition precedent to continued economic growth.

Important investing organizations, such as corporate pension funds, have increased the proportion of their funds going into common stocks.

Other investors in debt obligations have insisted upon higher interest rates in order to provide some protection against rising prices, or have made strenuous efforts to obtain other protection against inflation, in the form of equity in real property, warrants for the purchase of common stock at predetermined prices, or in some other form. This insistence upon some protection against inflation is a development of the fairly recent past; it reflects the deep-seated fear of inflation that pervades the investment markets.

Developments in more recent months provide strong support for the conclusion that more and more individuals are buying common stocks, and in some cases withdrawing funds from savings institutions for this purpose.

This underlying inflationary psychology has contributed to the upward course of prices of common stocks during the past 18 months or so. Other factors have, it is true, also contributed: The business recovery; the sharp improvement in corporate profits; and the widespread confidence in the dynamic growth of the American economy. But the fear of inflation is basic.

The underlying inflationary psychology is reflected also in sharp increases in real estate values.

CONTAINMENT OF INFLATION

Mr. President, no one should underestimate the difficulty of stopping the upward trend of costs and prices.

If this upward trend is to be stopped, and inflationary expectations are to be defeated, there are some things that must be done and some temptations that must be avoided:

First. The budget must show a surplus in periods of business boom, since unavoidably, as recent experience shows, large deficits will materialize in moderate business recessions. Strong restraint on spending programs is the prime prerequisite.

Second. Labor and management must settle their differences on bases that will not involve a steady rise in costs.

Third. In the field of debt management, the temptation must be avoided to concentrate Treasury financing in short-term securities and to use the Federal Reserve and the banking system to facilitate Treasury financing at low interest rates.

Fourth. In the field of credit policy, the temptation must be avoided to feed a business boom by continuous injections of bank reserves in an effort to insure that all would-be users of credit can satisfy their needs at low levels of interest rates.

Perhaps the greatest risks at the moment are in the areas of debt management and credit policy.

There is some danger that the progress that has been made in coping with the problem of inflation will be undermined by the adoption of easy credit, low interest rate policies.

A vote against the proposal to remove the interest rate ceiling on Treasury financing would be interpreted as a vote for inflation and a step in the direction of trying to peg interest rates at artificially low levels. A vote for the proposal to remove the interest rate ceiling would be interpreted as a vote against inflation and in support of a program designed to assure the future purchasing power of the dollar.

WORLD POSITION OF THE U.S. DOLLAR

Mr. President, we should repeal the interest ceiling on Treasury financing in order to avoid further loss of confidence in the future of the dollar on the part of foreign holders of large amounts of dollar assets. There is a real risk that loss of confidence may become cumulative. Should this develop, the United States could experience large losses of gold which would pose serious problems not only for the United States, but for the entire free world.

Consider the balance of payments situation: The balance of payments position in the United States has changed dramatically in the past 2 years.

The dollar gap has disappeared.

The dollar is still strong but it is no longer the only strong currency in the world. Convertibility is working satisfactorily and successfully in Europe and has contributed greatly to confidence in European currencies.

The United States is running an adverse balance of payments as the result of (a) a sharp decline in our surplus of exports over imports. This reflects the adverse competitive position of important American industries, in good part because of the expansion of modern and efficient productive capacity in other parts of the world, especially in Europe; (b) large Government outlays abroad, reflecting military expenditures, grants, and credits; (c) large private investments abroad.

There is a very real prospect that the U.S. balance of payments situation will continue adverse for some time, or may even deteriorate further.

Gold losses amounted to $2¼ billion in 1958 and are still continuing, although at a slower pace.

All these factors have contributed to a feeling of caution and uncertainty abroad with reference to the prospects for the dollar.

There are recurrent stories in the European press as to the weakness of the dollar and the possibility of an increase in the price of gold.

There is a fear abroad that continued loss of gold will result in our placing an embargo on further gold exports. That is why our continued loss of gold is a topic of interest in foreign financial centers.

Foreign observers invariably point out the crucial necessity of maintaining confidence here at home in the integrity of the U.S. dollar. They point out that if Americans begin to transfer funds to foreign centers in large amounts, the pressure on the U.S. gold stock would become intolerable.

Consequently, they emphasize the need to maintain the confidence of Americans in the dollar, that is, to eliminate the present fear that American prices will continue to rise indefinitely.

Foreign holdings of short-term dollar assets total in excess of $16 billion. Loss of confidence abroad could, therefore, mean large losses of gold and a rapid decline in the U.S. monetary gold stock.

Consider the causes of uncertainty: The major factors contributing to this foreign uncertainty as to the prospects for the dollar are:

The apparent inability of the United States to stop the wage-cost-price spiral. Foreigners are watching the current steel negotiations with great interest.

The American budget record, especially the huge deficit of fiscal 1959 incurred in connection with only a short and moderate decline in business activity. Foreigners regard the recent curbing of extravagant spending programs, by efforts of the President and a militant minority of Republicans and Democrats, as a favorable sign, but they are still questioning our ability to achieve even a moderate surplus in a business boom.

The pressure in some quarters for easy credit and low interest rates, regardless of conditions in the economy or in the credit markets. Foreigners interpret the criticism of the Federal Reserve for its policies of credit restraint in the 1955 and 1957 business boom and the criticism of the Treasury for its debt management policies as evidence of this desire for easy credit. They also view the various proposals that have been advanced to require the Federal Reserve to peg interest rates or to purchase long-term Government securities and the unwillingness in some quarters to raise the Treasury's interest rate ceiling, as part of this overall effort to force interest rates down to artificially low levels. Foreigners recognize, even if some Americans do not, that all these efforts and proposals, designed to reduce interest rates, will involve an increase in inflationary pressures in the American economy.

Foreigners are very sensitive to trends in the United States. They would regard a failure to remove or raise the Treasury's interest ceiling as a step in the direction of more short-term Treasury financing, increased inflationary pressures and enhanced weakness of the dollar.

So, we must be cautious. In this situation, the United States cannot afford to take any action that would disturb foreign confidence in the future of the dollar. Why?

Foreign holdings of short-term dollar assets are some $16 billion plus.

Withdrawal of any substantial amount would mean an increase in the gold outflow.

This would reduce our gold stock and raise more questions abroad as to how long we would permit the outflow to continue.

This development could very well impair the confidence of Americans in the dollar.

This spiral could have serious consequences not only for the United States but for the entire free world. Their monetary systems are closely linked with that of the United States.

Mr. President, I should like to reemphasize this point. We cannot legislate confidence in the dollar abroad. We must earn that confidence, and we must earn it all the time. We cannot have it today and lose it tomorrow and expect that we are going to have it next year. We can impair this confidence by embarking upon policies which foreigners, out of their own painful experience, know are unsound and end in acute inflationary pressures.

It is futile to think that we can fool our friends abroad. It does not make any difference to them whether we talk about our problems or not, whether they are ventilated on the floor or not. What they look at are the figures, and they judge us by the figures.

Mr. President, we cannot afford at this time or at any time, indeed, to shake the faith of our good neighbors abroad in the countries of the free world in the strength and integrity and credit of the Government of the United States.

The current issue is whether, by forcing a low interest rate policy, we shall undo the progress that has been made in budget matters, which up to now has helped to curb the inflationary fears that are so widespread, not only in the United States but also abroad, and has served to restore a somewhat greater measure of confidence in the dollar in foreign financial centers.

ECONOMIC GROWTH AND THE INTEREST CEILING

One of the chief objects of the current study being undertaken by the Joint Economic Committee is the study of economic growth, and I should like, Mr. President, to mention this in connection with the interest ceiling issue.

If the United States is to achieve sustained growth and avoid continued inflation, investor confidence in fixed-interest obligations must be restored. This cannot be achieved without restoring confidence in the future purchasing power of the dollar, and restoring the willingness to invest in Government bonds. This confidence cannot be attained if, as a nation, we embark upon a deliberate policy of forcing interest rates down, or require the Treasury to concentrate its financing in relatively short term issues that are not subject to the 4¼ percent interest ceiling. Both of these practices would undermine confidence in fixed-interest obligations and thus make it more difficult to achieve continued economic growth.

Repeal of the interest ceiling is required to help restore confidence in fixed-interest obligations.

Continued economic growth cannot be achieved without large investments in fixed assets of all kinds: Business plant and equipment; housing; commercial facilities; public improvements; and so forth. Only through large capital investment can the output per unit of labor be raised.

The great bulk of the capital investment in the United States is financed through the use of debt obligations—mortgages and bonds.

HOUSING

Borrowed money provides 60 to 90 percent of the cost of a house; without a plentiful supply of mortgage funds, the demand for housing would be greatly reduced.

STATE AND LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS

All manner of public improvements—highways, schools, water and sewerage facilities, public buildings, and so forth—are financed through the sale of bonds. Public improvements are dependent upon the continued flow of funds for investment in debt obligations.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Treasury financing, as well as State and local government financing, is done exclusively through the use of debt obligations.

BUSINESS

Some types of business enterprise, notably electric light and power, gas and telephone, rely upon debt financing to provide a large part of the funds required for the expansion and modernization of facilities. Manufacturing corporations have been able to finance a larger part of their plant programs out of the reinvestment of profits and depreciation; nonetheless, industrial corporations are still large users of credit, both short- and long-term.

If this flow of investment funds is to prove adequate for continued economic growth, several conditions must be fulfilled: First, people must be willing to save out of their current income; second, people must be willing either to invest their funds directly in debt obligations or to leave them with financial institutions which act as intermediaries and make the necessary investments; and, third, there must be a variety of different types of savings institutions, each performing the highly necessary service of accumulating and investing savings.

The willingness of people to save and to purchase debt obligations directly, or to leave their savings with these institutions, depends upon their confidence in the future purchasing power of the dollar.

There is ample evidence that increasingly during the past year, savers and investors have been shifting into stocks, real property and other so-called inflation hedges, and insisting upon higher returns on debt obligations in order to provide some protection against the risk of rising prices.

Removal of the interest ceiling would help reduce inflationary fears and would therefore be favorable to economic growth.

INTEREST RATES AND INFLATION

It is argued that rising interest rates mean higher costs. Therefore, it is argued, higher interest rates are inflationary. Consequently, any action that may contribute to higher interest rates should be avoided. This argument is fallacious, Mr. President. Comment as follows:

First. The contribution of higher interest rates to an increase in prices has been greatly exaggerated. For a variety of reasons, increases in interest rates have very little effect in pushing up costs and, consequently, their influence upon changes in specific prices or in the price level is minor.

Second. Higher interest rates have no effect upon the interest cost of outstanding interest-bearing obligations, but affect only the cost of new borrowings.

The increase in mortgage debt and bonds in any one year, on which higher interest rates have to be paid, is only a small percentage of the total outstanding.

This fact means that the impact of a period of high interest rates upon the carrying cost of long-term debt is of nominal proportions. Of course, the effects upon the cost of short-term borrowing are more immediate.

Third. Interest payments are not an important part of the costs of significant economic and social groups. Mortgage interest—the major interest expense of consumers—has a weight of only 1.7 percent in the consumer price index. Interest payments amount to only 1.2 percent of sales of business corporations. In public utilities, interest payments comprise only 5.8 percent of operating revenues, and only 4.8 percent in the case of natural gas pipeline companies. Net interest accounts for only 3.9 percent of total national income. An increase from 5½ to 6 percent on a $10,000 20-year mortgage would increase the monthly payments by only $2.90 per month, less the saving due to the fact that interest is a tax deduction. A lengthening of the terms of a real estate mortgage has much greater effect upon the interest burden over its life than does an increase in the mortgage rate. On a 20-year, 5½-percent mortgage, total interest over the life of the loan amounts to 65.1 percent of the face of the mortgage; at 6 percent, the corresponding figure is 72.1 percent. However, an increase in the maturity from 20 to 30 years, even if the rate is kept at 5½ percent, increases the interest cost to 104.5 percent of the mortgage.

Fourth. The impact of higher interest rates is further reduced by the fact that interest payments are a tax deduction for business corporations and for individuals.

The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] brought that out earlier in the afternoon, in his remarkable address on a related subject.

Fifth. The Treasury recoups, through taxation, a large part of any increase in its interest payments that results from an increase in the level of interest rates.

Sixth. The important consideration is not that higher interest rates are inflationary but rather that policies designed to keep interest rates at artificially low levels will generate inflationary pressures and result in rising costs and prices.

The burden posed by rising prices and costs is many times as large as the larger outlays for interest that would be required if market forces were allowed to operate in the investment and credit markets.

The cost of trying to keep interest rates down is much greater than permitting them to find their level in the marketplace.

EFFECT OF REMOVING CEILING

Now it is argued that the removal of the ceiling on interest rates on Treasury bonds would result in a general rise of all interest rates, and would also increase the cost of carrying the Government debt.

This argument is fallacious for the following reasons:

First. The present levels of interest rates reflect the strength of the business recovery, large credit demands pressing upon an inadequate supply of savings, and the fear of inflation which has discouraged investment in fixed-interest obligations—bonds.

Second. Removing the ceiling on Treasury bonds would help dampen inflationary psychology; it would indicate a determination to use all available tools to contain inflationary pressures; it would reduce the threat of large-scale inflationary Treasury financing through the sale of short-term issues to the banking system; it would help reestablish the confidence of investors in debt obligations. All these mean reduced upward pressure on interest rates.

Third. Removal of the interest rate ceiling would contribute to a readjustment and realinement of the interest rates on various maturities of debt obligations. The necessity of concentrating Treasury financing in bills, certificates, and notes maturing within 5 years has forced up yields on short- and medium-term securities. Elimination of the ceiling would relieve the upward pressure on these interest rates.

Fourth. The facts are that today yields on outstanding long-term Treasury obligations are lower than the rates the Treasury has had to pay on some of the short- and medium-term securities it has been forced to use in its recent financing operations—issues of 1-year and 4-year-9-month notes were sold in July at 4¾ percent. My proposal would free the hands of the Treasury and enable it to do its financing in the way that is most appropriate and economical in the light of conditions prevailing in the credit markets. This does not mean that the Treasury would immediately undertake to issue huge amounts of long-term debt; it would continue to adjust its financing to conditions in the market. But the Treasury could do a better and more efficient job if it were free to adapt its financing to market conditions.

THE COST OF BORROWING

It has been argued that removal of the ceiling on Treasury bonds would raise the cost of borrowing and increase the difficulties of borrowing by small business, home owners, and State and local governments.

This argument also is fallacious for the following reasons:

First. If the ceiling is removed, the Treasury is not likely to enter the market forthwith with tremendous amounts of long-term borrowings.

Debt management practices in recent years show that the Treasury is cautious in its use of long-term obligations; it has limited long-term financing to amounts that can be absorbed without having an undue effect upon the long-term capital markets.

However, the Treasury should not be prevented from issuing securities of long maturity by the existence of the present ceiling on interest rates. That is exactly the position the Treasury is in. It is being prevented right now.

Second. It is not at all certain that the sale of moderate amounts of long-term Government bonds would in fact reduce the supply of funds available for investment in mortgages and bonds, or mean significantly higher long-term interest rates.

The willingness on the part of investors to put funds into long-term Treasury obligations depends upon their confidence in the future of the purchasing power of the dollar.

A show of determination by the Treasury to cope with the inflation problem and to avoid inflationary financing of the Treasury debt would help weaken inflation psychology and expectations.

As a consequence, investors would be more willing to invest funds in long-term debt obligations.

Under these conditions, a moderately higher rate of return on long-term bonds might well induce the shift into bonds of some investment funds that are now held in other investment media.

Third. The Treasury should be in a position to claim part of the savings of the country.

The Treasury will have to be able to attract some funds from long-term investors if a progressive shortening of the debt, with all its inflationary implications, is to be avoided.

The Treasury, due to the interest rate ceiling, is not in a position to attract such long-term funds at the present time.

Fourth. The borrowing position of the Treasury has suffered progressively over the years from the development of increasingly effective competition from other borrowers. As a result, investors are demanding, on Treasury obligations, rates that are increasingly competitive with rates offered by other borrowers. Some of the factors contributing to the growingly adverse competitive position of the Treasury in the capital markets are:

State and local governments have the advantage of tax exemption, while interest on Treasury obligations is subject to Federal taxation. The present high rates of personal and corporate income taxes have increased the advantage enjoyed by State and local governments.

Home owners enjoy the advantage of a system of guarantee and insurance under which the credit of the U.S. Government backs the mortgage. Currently, insured and guaranteed mortgages carry rates 1 percentage point higher than the 4¼ percent which the Treasury is permitted to pay on its own bonds. Furthermore, interest payments on mortgages are a deduction for income tax purposes.

Corporations are able to pay well for borrowed money since its cost to them is reduced by the fact that 52 percent of the interest payments are offset by a reduction in Federal income taxes.

There is little prospect that these factors, which have worsened the competitive borrowing position of the Treasury, will be eliminated or even reduced. Consequently, the only way in which the Treasury can raise funds in the long-term market is to pay rates that are more closely competitive with rates paid by other borrowers. This is not possible under the present ceiling.

Small businesses do not borrow in the long-term capital markets in significant amounts; most of their funds are obtained from banks and from miscellaneous local sources.

Furthermore, the Federal Government is already providing substantial assistance to small business.

WHO BENEFITS FROM HIGHER INTEREST RATES?

It has been argued that the removal of the interest rate ceiling would benefit mainly the commercial banks, other large financial institutions and the wealthy.

I remind the Senate that the commercial banks are having a field day today with the short-term market for securities, and especially the short-term market for Treasury bonds. They could not ask for anything better than what they have. They do not invest in long-term Treasury bonds anyway. Those banks who do should not do so. Such practices are discouraged by State bank examiners and others; but short-term maturities—5 years and under—are the haven for commercial banks to invest deposits which are not needed in connection with their lending activities. So they could not have a better time than they are having now, while short-term interest rates are at such a high level.

The reason why short-term interest rates are at such high levels is that the Treasury has been forced to go into the short-term market to the extent of $6 billion or $7 billion of new money between now and the end of the year, and it has been going in there recently to help finance the $12½ billion deficit. It has been forced to do this in the short-term market. This is what is driving the short-term market up, in large part. If we take the Treasury out of that market and put it into the long-term bond market, the banks will not buy the long-term bonds. They will remain in short-term securities, and the interest rates on those will go down. So the argument that the banks might benefit by holding the long-term interest rate down is perfectly unsound, in my judgment.

There is no basis for the argument that if the interest rate ceiling were removed the main beneficiaries would be the commercial banks or other large financial institutions, or wealthy people. I do not believe that that assertion can possibly be proved in any way.

Removal of the interest rate ceiling on Government bonds will not necessarily be followed by a general rise of all interest rates. By reestablishing confidence both here and abroad in the determination of the Federal Government to finance outside the banking system, fears of inflation will be reduced and the willingness of investors to place their funds in fixed-income obligations will be enhanced.

Interest payments from Federal, corporate, and State and local government securities, and from mortgage investments, are widely dispersed among the millions of savers in the economy, either through savings institutions or through direct investment in bonds or mortgages.

There are 22 million accounts in mutual savings banks, averaging $1,527, and totaling $34 billion.

There are almost 24 million accounts in savings and loan associations, averaging $2,024, and totaling $48 billion.

There are over 37 million savings accounts at commercial banks, averaging $962, and totaling $40 billion.

There are some 8 million people participating in payroll savings plans to buy U.S. savings bonds, and altogether there are about 40 million who own savings bonds. Some $42½ billion of series E and H savings bonds are outstanding.

There are 112 million people with savings in the form of life insurance, with an average equity of about $800—a total of $107 billion.

There are about 14 million people who are beneficiaries of noninsured pension plans. The assets of these plans total over $22 billion and are invested heavily in corporate and Government bonds. Including dependents, the number of people covered would be significantly larger.

The upper-income groups account for about 10 percent of the population. Their share of total interest received has fallen to about 25 percent, compared to over 50 percent in the 1920's. A lesser share of interest payments is actually retained by the wealthy than by middle or lower income families, because of the higher income tax rates that apply to the upper income groups.

The bulk of interest on the public debt is paid to individuals, mutual institutions, such as savings banks and insurance companies, and public pension and other trust funds. Those interest payments which are received by commercial banks and business corporations are, in major part, recouped by the Treasury through the 52 percent income tax rate which applies to these investors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a table which shows the interest on the public debt as it was paid to individuals and mutual institutions in 1946 and in 1958; also to other investors. This is a very short table.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[In billions of dollars]

	Interest on the public debt
	1946	1958
Individuals and mutual institutions	1.9	2.4
Public funds (including Federal Reserve)	1.0	2.7
Other investors	1.8	2.5
Total	4.7	7.6

Mr. BUSH. Rising interest rates affect only new borrowers, and do not change the amount of interest paid by those who have previously incurred debt through mortgages, and so forth. Rising rates are therefore not detrimental to those who are already in debt, since only the new borrowers pay the higher rates.

When interest rates rise, savings institutions and other investors in fixed-income obligations experience a decline in the capital value of their holdings. For example, commercial banks wishing to reduce their portfolios of Government securities find they must take a capital loss if they sell their holdings. Rising interest rates therefore are to the lenders' disadvantage in this respect.

The function of rising interest rates is to restrain new borrowing at a time when demands are already high; new borrowing swells the spending stream and pushes up prices during a period of economic boom. If the underlying wants of every household and business in the country were made effective through unlimited access to borrowed money at low rates, the upward pressure on commodity prices would be fantastic.

In the last analysis, the beneficiaries of higher interest rates are not merely the savers, who make funds available for investment, and who benefit directly from the larger returns that higher interest rates bring, but every household benefits in a very real sense by being protected from the ravages of the inflation that would otherwise take place.

BILLS ONLY POLICY

Mr. President, it is contended that one reason the Treasury has been encountering difficulties in its financing operations is that the Federal Reserve has been limiting its open market operations to short-term Treasury obligations, normally, Treasury bills.

Mr. President, the Federal Reserve, so it is said, should be directed to depart from this policy and to conduct its operations in long-term Treasury securities.

Such a specific directive to the Federal Reserve to conduct open market operations in longer term securities is both unnecessary and unwise.

ORIGIN

The policy of generally limiting open market operations to short-term Treasury obligations—normally, Treasury bills—was adopted by the Federal Reserve Open Market Committee in 1953, after an exhaustive study of the operation of the Government securities market. This study supported the conclusion that the present policy would contribute to the effective functioning of the Government securities market.

DEPARTURE FROM CUSTOMARY PRACTICE

The Federal Reserve has departed from customary practice on several occasions in the past few years, namely, in November 1955, early in 1957, and again in 1958. These operations were undertaken in order to assist Treasury financing, to help correct disorderly conditions in the Government securities market, and to help effectuate the objectives of credit policy. Consequently, the practice of limiting open market operations to short-term Treasury obligations is not rigid and inflexible.

DIFFERENCES OF OPINION

The current practice of customarily limiting open market operations to Treasury bills has given rise to some differences of opinion, even within the Federal Reserve System. It is important that these differences within the System be put in proper perspective.

The differences of judgment within the Federal Reserve System do not relate to such basic matters as the objectives of credit policy, or the scope and function of the various instruments of credit policy. Nor are there any differences of opinion as to the central role that bank reserves play in credit policy. There is complete agreement that one of the primary purposes of credit policy is to influence the volume of bank reserves. Beyond this, no one in the Federal Reserve System wants to return to the practice of pegging interest rates, or to have the Federal Reserve undertake to maintain a set pattern of interest rates in the marketplace. These are fundamentals on which there is definite and specific agreement within the Federal Reserve System.

The differences of opinion relate rather to matters of technique and day-to-day operations. There are some who believe that there have been occasions in the past when the purchase or sale of Government obligations other than Treasury bills might have achieved the desired results with a smaller volume of purchases or sales than were required under the practice of limiting dealings to Treasury bills. Even then, there have probably been relatively few occasions since the present policy was adopted in 1953 when those who favor operating in a broader list of securities would have conducted any significant amount of operations in securities other than Treasury bills.

INFLUENCE ON INTEREST RATES

The Federal Reserve can influence long-term interest rates without intervening directly in the long-term securities markets and without incurring the additional problems and difficulties that such intervention would entail. The response of interest rates to changes in credit policy has not been limited to short-term money market rates; it has been evident in long-term yields as well. Long- and short-term interest rates tend to move in the same direction at about the same time.

A basic reason why the Federal Reserve does not have to deal in long-term obligations to affect interest rates is because the major impact of open market operations upon the credit markets comes as a result of their effects upon the volume of reserves made available to the banking system. Open market purchases or sales of Treasury bills have the same effects upon bank reserves as would equivalent dealings in long-term obligations.

PEGGING INTEREST RATES

Some of those who advocate the conduct of open market operations in a wider list of Treasury obligations would not limit the change in practice to occasional departures from the current practice of conducting open market operations in Treasury bills. They desire to have the Federal Reserve conduct its operations so as to achieve lower levels of long-term interest rates. This would saddle the Federal Reserve with the necessity of pegging interest rates at artificially low levels and of maintaining a pattern of interest rates in the market.

Operations in Treasury bills can be conducted more easily and expeditiously, and with less risk of an overly large impact upon securities prices, than can dealing in long-term obligations. The market for Treasury bills is a fluid and active market; dealers' inventories of short-term obligations are ordinarily much larger than are their inventories of long-term obligations; a much larger proportion of long-term bonds is held by relatively permanent investors; and a given change in yields will obviously have a much greater impact upon prices of long-term obligations than upon the prices of Treasury bills, due to the longer maturity. Consequently, operations in Treasury bills are far less likely to give rise to false expectations in the market, and to the maladjustments, instability and wide fluctuations in prices which would ensue, should these expectations be proved wrong.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that the Federal Reserve should support the long-term Government securities market by purchasing long-term securities. In order to avoid adding to bank reserves, the Federal Reserve would sell equal amounts of short-term obligations. It is argued that this operation would help to stabilize the long-term Government securities market, reduce the cost of credit for long-term borrowers, and assist the Treasury in its debt management operations.

This fallacious argument proposes a most dangerous and unwise course of action.

This proposal is particularly inappropriate and dangerous in a period of expanding business when business confidence is ebullient, speculative sentiment is strong, investment spending on housing and business plant and equipment is rising, and demands for credit are running in excess of savings. Under these conditions, credit policy should be designed to restrain the expansion of bank credit, prevent unsustainably high rates of investment spending and limit the growth of liquid assets in the economy. This proposal would run counter to these basic objectives.

The exchange of short-term for long-term securities on the part of the Federal Reserve would have two effects upon liquidity in the economy—both of which would be just the opposite of what is required in a period of business expansion and high level activity, namely: (a) the liquidity of the Federal Reserve banks would be reduced; and (b) the liquidity of the rest of the economy would be increased.

If this policy were followed to an important extent, the Federal Reserve would be denuded of holdings of short-term obligations. This would greatly complicate the task of day-to-day operations in the money market—operations which are essential to the efficient functioning of the money market. In addition, with its supply of short-term obligations depleted, the Federal Reserve would find it very difficult to apply a policy of credit restraint. Its open market operations would necessarily be limited to sales of medium-term obligations; such sales would adversely affect the prices of long-term Treasury bonds and therefore would run counter to the mandate to support the prices of these obligations.

EFFECT UPON COMMERCIAL BANKS

This policy, if adopted, would also make it easier for the commercial banks to avoid the impact of a policy of credit restraint on their lending operations. The banks would be in a position to exchange their holdings of long-term Government securities for short-dated obligations. This would increase their liquidity and make it easy for them to obtain funds for the expansion of loans by permitting some of these short-term obligations to mature.

EFFECT UPON TREASURY DEBT MANAGEMENT

This proposal is advanced on the ground, among others, that it would ease the Treasury's debt management problems. The practical effect would be just the reverse—to further complicate and make more difficult the Treasury's task of debt management. The purchase of long-term bonds by the Federal Reserve would raise the prices and thus reduce the yields obtainable on them, making them less attractive to investors, at the very time that other demands for long-term funds are at high levels, and attractive yields are available on non-Government bonds and mortgages.

In addition, more of the short-term Treasury debt would be lodged outside the Federal Reserve System as the Federal Reserve sold its short-term securities in order to purchase longer term bonds. Holders of the short-term securities could convert them into cash by allowing them to mature, whereas if these obligations were held by the Federal Reserve, they would be exchanged for new refunding issues. The result is that attrition on maturing Treasury obligations would be increased and the Treasury would be confronted with the necessity of raising additional funds under adverse market conditions.

EFFECT UPON CAPITAL INVESTMENT

This policy, if it were effective, would mean higher prices for long-term Government bonds. This would encourage holders to sell these securities to the Federal Reserve and to put the proceeds in other long-term investments, such as mortgages, bonds, real property, or common stock. In turn this would encourage building, construction and business plant and equipment programs, at the very time when confidence is strong and these activities are expanding cyclically. The result would be to increase the danger of too rapid expansion in capital investment, with overbuilding and overexpansion of plant capacity as the ultimate result. Sooner or later, it would become evident that those sectors of the economy were expanding at an unsustainable rate; the result would be a sharp cutback, with all its adverse effects upon the general level of business activity and employment.

Achieving some reasonable stabilization of capital investment is one of the cardinal objectives of a program designed to avoid sharp cyclical fluctuations in business activity and employment. The adoption of this proposal would make more difficult the achievement of this basic objective of economic policy.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF SAVINGS

In a period of business expansion and high level activity, demands for investment funds customarily run in excess of savings. One way to encourage savings is to offer higher rates of interest on the various savings media. This proposal, designed to achieve lower interest rates, would run counter to this basic objective. Beyond this, long-term growth depends essentially upon the volume of savings available for long-term investment in capital assets of various kinds. Forcing long-term interest rates to artificially low levels would therefore not be favorable to economic growth.

PEGGING INTEREST RATES

The proposal has been advanced that the Federal Reserve return to the practice of pegging interest rates, in order to ease the financing problems of the Treasury and to reduce the cost of funds to borrowers. Some of the sponsors of this proposal have suggested that there is no inflationary risk in such an operation, since the reserve requirements of the commercial banks could be increased sufficiently to absorb any additions to bank reserves that would result from such pegging operations.

Interest rates can be pegged at levels lower than otherwise would prevail in the credit markets only by having the Federal Reserve provide a ready market for credit instruments—presumably Treasury obligations—(a) at prices higher than otherwise would prevail in the market, and (b) with the Federal Reserve standing ready to buy the Treasury obligations offered to it by holders, bank and nonbank alike.

EXPERIENCE WITH PEGGING

The American experience with efforts to peg interest rates has been consistently unfortunate and adverse. The tremendous pegging operation undertaken in connection with the financing of World War II resulted in a huge increase in the money supply and in holdings of liquid assets in the economy; these, in turn, were major contributors to the sharp postwar rise in prices.

The experience with pegging operations in the postwar period, even though reserve requirements were increased in an attempt to offset the inflationary effects, was equally adverse. For example, the outbreak of the Korean war resulted in a tremendous upsurge in the demand for credit and sharp increases in commodity prices. Because of the pegging policy to which it was then committed, the Federal Reserve was unable to follow an effective policy of credit restraint. In the 12 months from mid-1950 to mid-1951, the Federal Reserve increased reserve requirements by some $2 billion in an effort to restrain credit expansion; however, the effects of this action were more than fully negated by purchases by the Federal Reserve, under the pegging arrangements, of $4.6 billion of Government securities. The situation became so serious as to lead to the termination, in March 1951, of the arrangement between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve, under which the latter had undertaken to support the prices of Government obligations.

CONTROL OVER BANK RESERVES

Perhaps the most serious result of the adoption of a policy of pegging interest rates at artificially low levels is that the Federal Reserve thereby relinquishes its control over the amount of reserves provided to the banking system. The Federal Reserve, under this policy, has to stand ready to buy Treasury obligations in the amounts offered by bank and nonbank holders alike and these purchases increase bank reserves. The decision to increase reserves thereby rests with the holders of Government securities and not with the Federal Reserve. Obviously, the Federal Reserve cannot pursue an effective credit policy under these conditions.

Thus, the purchase of Government obligations by the Federal Reserve, an unavoidable feature of a pegging operation, adds to the volume of reserves available to the banking system. Under the American fractional reserve system, each $1 addition to member bank reserves can be used to support an expansion of $6 to $7 in bank loans and/or investments, and in bank deposits. With the volume of bank reserves increased, the potential for credit expansion is increased, regardless of whether the Federal Reserve purchases securities from commercial banks or from nonbank holders. This poses very difficult problems for the Federal Reserve, because at the time of high level economic activity, when purchases under the pegging policy would be at their peak, large additions to bank reserves would be most inappropriate.

MINIMIZING CYCLICAL FLUCTUATIONS

This policy of pegging interest rates would greatly impair, if in fact it would not destroy, the power and ability of the Federal Reserve to follow a policy of credit restraint at the time when restraint is most needed, namely, when a business boom is well under way. When business expansion has been proceeding rapidly and when record levels of business activity are being attained, as is the case today, business sentiment is optimistic; credit demands are large; upward pressure on interest rates is evident; and the turnover of the money supply is rising. These are the conditions that can easily end in a speculative splurge or in the development of a pronounced business boom, both of which carry the prospect of accompanying excesses and maladjustments and the risk of subsequent correction in business activity and employment.

Under these conditions, the objectives of a policy designed to minimize cyclical fluctuations in business activity should be:

To limit the increase in the money supply, since in a period of business expansion, the rate of turnover of money normally rises in any event.

To restrain the growth of the liquid assets in the economy, in order to minimize the risk that business optimism or speculative psychology may contribute to a bidding up of prices on real property or equities to unsustainable levels.

To place some restraint upon building, construction, and equipment programs of business in order to avoid the risk of substantial overcapacity and the prospect of sharp cutbacks in outlays later, with their disruptive effects upon business activity and employment.

In the present situation especially, to dampen inflationary expectations and speculative psychology.

To restrain the expansion of bank loans.

Adoption of the policy of pegging interest rates would run counter to these basic objectives; it would increase the chances that maladjustments and excesses would develop in the period of business expansion, and these would increase the chances of sharper contractions in the next adjustment phase of the business cycle.

EFFECT UPON LIQUID ASSETS

Pegging operations would increase the liquid asset holdings of the sellers—savings and investing institutions, commercial banks, individuals, and other investors—at the very time when sound contracyclical policy would make this development most unwise and unfortunate. There is no way that this result of a pegging operation can be avoided; it is inherent in the proposal that the Federal Reserve increase its holdings of long-term Treasury obligations.

The pegging operation would also mean an increase in the money supply. The sale of Treasury obligations to the Federal Reserve by holders other than commercial banks—that is, savings and investing institutions, individuals, business corporations, foundations, educational institutions, and so forth—would mean an increase in bank deposits, and hence in the money supply. Here again, there is nothing the Federal Reserve can do to prevent the increase in bank deposits that would result from its pegging operations, unless it could induce the sellers of long-term securities to replace them with short-term obligations. The latter is a most unlikely development; sellers of long-term Governments would want the proceeds in order to put them to work in some more attractive long-term outlet they would not sell long-term securities and replace them, in substantial amounts, with short-term Treasury obligations. Consequently, the pegging operation would unavoidably result in an increase in bank deposits and in the money supply.

HIGHER BOND PRICES—CAPITAL INVESTMENT

To the extent that a pegging policy was effective, the pegging operation would tend to maintain prices of bonds at higher levels, and bond yields at lower levels, than otherwise would be the case. This has a number of effects, all of which are inimical to a program of avoiding extreme cyclical fluctuations in the economy.

One result would be that holders of long-term Government securities would be in an advantageous position to sell them to the Federal Reserve and to put the proceeds at work either in the mortgage market, the bond market, the stock market, or in the real estate market. This situation, coupled with the fact that long-term interest rates would be lower than otherwise would be the case, would provide added incentive for capital investment and thus increase the risk that the rise in capital investment that is typical of a period of expanding business would be carried to excess and culminate in the construction of excess capacity. The increased availability of long-term funds and the artificially low interest rates that would result from an aggressive pegging policy both would help to encourage capital investment.

EFFECTS OF REMOVING ADDITIONAL BAN RESERVES

Some of the sponsors of a resumption of pegging make the point that the reserves resulting from the purchases by the Federal Reserve could be sterilized or removed by increasing reserve requirements by an amount sufficient to absorb the reserves created by the pegging operation.

First, it is true, viewing the banking system as a whole, that reserves resulting from pegging operations could theoretically be absorbed by increases in reserve requirements. Second, it is equally true that such a procedure would involve serious unpredictable consequences for the banking system and for the credit markets.

There is no way to tell in advance how large the purchases by the Federal Reserve might have to be; the higher the support prices, obviously, the larger would be the purchases and the consequent additions to bank reserves. These purchases could assume colossal proportions: as pointed out above, they amounted to $4.6 billion from mid-1950 to mid-1951, in our latest experience with pegging; it may be pertinent to point out that nearly all these purchases were concentrated in the period during which the Federal Reserve was pegging interest rates.

A pegging policy, coupled with a policy of offsetting increases in reserves through higher reserve requirements, would have highly uncertain and disruptive effects upon the commercial banks. There is no way to increase the reserve requirements of those particular banks that would gain the added reserves resulting from a pegging operation, if in fact the amount of such gains could be measured. It would be necessary to increase reserve requirements by classes of banks. The result would be that some banks would find themselves short of reserves, faced with the necessity of liquidating Government obligations or calling loans; other banks would be net gainers on balance, and end up with excess reserves.

Such disruptions are an unavoidable feature of changes in reserve requirements but the consequences are not too important if the changes in reserve requirements are fairly infrequent. However, an arrangement in which changes in reserve requirements were geared into the volume of support operations by the Federal Reserve would confront bank managements with uncertainties and unpredictables that would greatly complicate the task of managing their loans and investment portfolios.

The banks which gained reserves from pegging operations would probably, in an expanding economy and with large demands for loans, decide to expand their loan accounts rather than to increase their holdings of short-term Governments. This would effectively defeat a policy of credit restraint, so far as these banks are concerned.

There is another problem, namely, how the banks that come under pressure due to the increase in reserve requirements would balance their position—particularly if they could not sell their short-term Governments to the banks that received the benefit of the increased reserves resulting from the pegging operations. Thus the Federal Reserve would be faced with other difficult decisions.

The Federal Reserve could permit banks to meet their reserve deficiencies by continued borrowings, but this would run counter to the basic premise that total reserves available to the banking system be held constant despite the pegging operation. Or the Federal Reserve could force the member banks to adjust their positions through sales of short-term Governments. This would put short-term interest rates under severe upward pressure, with an ensuing rise in the cost of short-term borrowing to the Treasury. If the Federal Reserve stepped into the short-term market to alleviate this upward pressure, then it would be running counter to the stated objective of not permitting pegging operations to contribute to an increase in bank reserves.

The conclusion is clear: In practice, resumption of pegging would pose the threat of large increases in the reserves available to the banking system, and this threat would not be eliminated by increases in reserve requirements.

PEGGING: AN INFLATIONARY POLICY

Thus, the inescapable conclusion is that pegging interest rates will unquestionably and unavoidably result in an increase in liquid asset holdings in the country, and in an increase in the money supply; that it will increase the chances of business expansions developing maladjustments and excesses which could contribute to subsequent declines in activity and employment; that it would provide further support for inflationary expectations and for speculative psychology; and that it would be quite impossible for the Federal Reserve to follow a realistic credit policy attuned to conditions in the economy and in the credit markets, and at the same time engage in pegging interest rates.

Keeping interest rates at artificially low levels at the top of a business boom would have two additional serious effects. In the first place, it would discourage the increase in savings that is required if higher levels of capital investment are to be financed without recourse to inflationary devices. Recent experience demonstrates that higher interest rates are effective in encouraging savings; they should be allowed to have this highly desirable and necessary effect in a period of high level business activity.

In the second place, the adoption of a pegging policy designed to maintain artificially low interest rates would provide further encouragement to speculative psychology and doubtless contribute to further upward pressures on the prices of common stocks. Investors would rightly interpret the adoption of a pegging policy as a step in the direction of more inflation and inflationary expectations would be increased. Also, to the extent that lower interest rates could be achieved, the incentive to put funds into fixed interest obligations would be reduced, and a larger share of available investment funds would find its way into the stock market or into investment in real property.

Mr. President, I do not intend to ask for a vote on the amendment which I have discussed, namely, the removal of all ceilings on interest rates for the long-term bonds of the Treasury. I feel however, as I stated at the opening of my remarks, that this is the most serious issue confronting Congress today. Not only is it the most serious of all domestic issues, but it is the most serious of all issues. On the proper handling and proper management of our fiscal affairs by the Treasury and of our monetary policies by the Federal Reserve Board depend the financing of the whole defense effort of the country; and upon them depend so much of the defense effort of the whole free world. In fact, as I have said repeatedly, the cause of freedom depends more upon the credit of the Government of the United States than upon any other single thing.

I know they will not do so today, but I urge Senators, in the coming weeks, to study the problem. I venture the hope that when we return next winter we can untie the hands of the Treasury, so that they may deal with this very knotty problem as it must be dealt with, and the the Treasury may be given the freedom and leeway to handle the public debt in an efficient manner, so as to protect, as far as possible, the interests of all the people, and to reduce the inflationary forces which are pressed upon them by these restrictive practices upon which Congress insists at the present time.

CONGRESS SHIRKS ITS DUTY

The Congress will be guilty of dangerous imprudence and irresponsibility if it fails to take action on President Eisenhower's recommendation, repeated in a special message this week, that authority be given for removing the statutory ceiling on Treasury bond interest rates and for raising the rate payable on savings bonds. The House Ways and Means Committee, after an earlier decision to approve the necesary legislation, reversed itself last week and voted to table it for this year.

Although U.S. Government securities generally are considered the safest in the world, the current situation is this: The Treasury Department is unable to sell its bonds—obligations maturing in more than 5 years—at the maximum 4.25 percent rate of return which was fixed by law many years ago. As a consequence, it has been forced to meet its tremendous financing needs through the marketing of short-term securities—bills and certificates—on which there is no interest ceiling. Only recently a 1-year issue of bills was marketed at a near-record rate of 4.728 percent—the lowest the Government could find by competitive bidding in a free market. Short-term securities are held mostly by commercial banks and are employed in the banking system for an expansion of credit which, in effect, increases the supply of money and is directly inflationary as a result.

DEBT MANAGEMENT PROPOSALS

As both the President and Secretary of Treasury Anderson have emphasized, the picture of this seemingly deliberate policy of contributing to inflationary pressures raises grave questions both at home and abroad about our sense of responsibility in our fiscal management. It is quite possible, from that point, to question whether our money—the U.S. dollar—should continue to be practically the standard for the whole world, as it has been for so long. If and when it ceases to be, our entire economy is in jeopardy.

As for the savings bonds, even the most politically motivated individual should be responsive to the implications of the present problem. Approximately 40 million persons hold these small-denomination securities to a total value of $42 billion. They have been urged by their Government to buy them, but the current maximum rate of interest of 3.26 percent neither gives a fair return on today's savings nor offers a cash-in value that is commensurate in purchasing power with their original price. For this reason, cash-ins have exceeded new purchases for months past.

This issue of interest rates has been made a political football on Capitol Hill. It is time for the responsible leadership of Congres to demonstrate its understanding and its interest in a matter of major importance to the national welfare.

INFLATIONARY VOTE

President Eisenhower is reported in dispatches from Washington to be considering a public appeal in behalf of legislation to enable the Treasury to stimulate the Government bond market by raising interest rates above the 4.25 percent ceiling on long-term securities. Needed though the legislation is, such a move seems foredoomed to failure in view of the 14–11 party-line vote by which the House Ways and Means Committee turned it down.

Although we often disagree with Representative RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania, the top Republican on the committee, in this case he is right in describing the committee action as "incredible folly." As he observes, the Government will be forced to borrow in the short-term money market in competition with State and local governments, business, and consumers. This is likely to force upward the cost of short-term money and to inflate the supply of credit.

The surprise action of the committee is difficult to understand, since it was a reversal of an August 12 decision to approve the measure. As part of that decision the committee included a directive which said, in part: "It is the sense of Congress that the Government shall take into account—the importance of achieving the maximum sustainable rate of economic growth, maintaining reasonable stability of the purchasing power of the dollar, and assuring that the cost of managing the public debt is kept to the minimum consistent with these vital objectives."

The 14 Democrats who voted to suspend action for this session on the legislation must know they voted against "economic growth." The Treasury should be enabled to compete with other borrowers in the money market. The discarded compromise bill would have permitted it to do so for 3 years, a reasonable period. The author of the measure, Democratic Representative HARRISON, of Virginia, joined the 10 committee Republicans in voting for the bill. It is too bad he could not have persuaded two additional Democrats to join them.

PLAYING POLITICS WITH THE PUBLIC DEBT

The question of lifting the 4¼ percent ceiling on interest rates for marketable Treasury bonds, according to SAM RAYBURN, is a dead issue in this session of Congress. But he did leave the door open yesterday for a possible boost in the ceiling on series

E and H savings bonds from the present 3¼ percent to 3¾ percent.

The Democrats have hoped to use the bond issue to tag the Republicans a "high interest rate" party. But it would be politically ticklish to oppose a clearly merited rise in interest rates on savings bonds, which are held by 40 million Americans, most of them voters.

The 3¼ percent rate now makes these bonds a poor buy; for the past 12 months, in fact, sales have lagged behind redemptions. In July $350 million were sold, $507 million redeemed. Not only is the Treasury over a barrel but the small investor isn't getting a fair shake.

Action to provide an equitable rate on these bonds is needed, but action to free rates on regular Treasury bonds is equally urgent. Bonds already issued are selling in the open market at prices yielding more than 4¼ percent, so that new long-term issues (the only ones to which the ceiling applies) can't be sold. Sound management of the Nation's $290 billion debt is one of the pillars of fiscal stability and is impossible without long-term borrowing. Within the next 12 months the Treasury will have to borrow $85 billion to cover maturing securities, redemptions, and seasonal cash needs. Unless Congress acts, this will have to be done without access to long-term funds. Speaker RAYBURN knows this, Senator JOHNSON knows it. It's up to them to put politics aside, and act promptly to free the Treasury from artificial and fiscally dangerous restrictions.

[From the New York Times]

THE INTEREST CEILING ISSUE

President Eisenhower at his news conference Tuesday renewed—and in the most emphatic manner—his request first made to Congress on June 8 that the existing ceilings applying to interest rates on Government bonds be removed or liberalized.

The ceiling on marketable securities is 4¼ percent, and applies to issues with maturities of 5 years or longer. This legislation is in the nature of an anachronistic accident. It has no logical relationship to present conditions in the bond market. It was enacted in 1918 in connection with the second Liberty Loan financing of World War I, and was based on conditions then contemporary but today purely history.

What makes this legislation imperative is that the Treasury must raise vast sums in the months ahead in order (1) to fund a constant proceession of maturing obligations, and (2) to raise new money to pay for the appropriations voted by Congress and not covered by taxes. As much as possible of such financing should take the form of securities designed to appeal to savers since, when money is raised through savings, it has no inflationary effects. In practice this means that, broadly speaking, it should be raised through the sale of long-term securities. But with business in a boom phase at present, the demands of borrowers of all categories in the money market are extremely heavy. These demands, competing for a comparatively limited supply of funds, have driven interest rates sharply upward. With the market rate on comparatively long issues above 4¼ percent the Treasury finds itself in a position in which it has no alternative but to raise its funds through the sale of short-term paper, a procedure inflationary in its implications because it involves the creation of bank credit or expansion of the money supply.

The present ceiling on savings bonds, from which the President has also asked relief, is roughly 3¼ percent, a rate that makes it impossible for the Government to compete actively with other available outlets for savings. This is not only a grave injustice to the 40 million patriotic holders of savings bonds in the Nation, but it is a potential threat of the most serious kind to the whole Government savings bond program, itself a major bulwark against monetary inflation.

Savings bonds outstanding total $50.5 billion. That figure exceeds by $2 billion the total of all publicly held marketable issues of the U.S. Treasury with maturities of 5 years or longer. Every dollar that is withdrawn by a savings bond holder is a dollar that the Treasury will have to replace, and that, so long as present interest limitations remain in effect, it will have to replace by raising the money through methods highly inflationary.

[From the Rockford Morning Star, Aug. 21, 1959]

IN FISCAL FOG

There is a striking similarity between the arguments for keeping interest on U.S. Treasury indebtedness low and the old argument for retention of a nickel subway fare. Low interest is a political shibboleth just as, in the old days, the nickel fare was. There isn't any honesty in an argument for either; the public pays.

Yet the backers of cheap interest in Congress have stood fast against any rational approach to the problem the Treasury faces in handling the Government's fiscal problem in an era of rising deficits and generally higher interest on other bonds. Treasury Secretary Anderson and President Eisenhower have stressed the bleak necessity of encouraging greater investment in Government paper by permitting a higher interest rate on long-term bonds. Because it is deemed politically expedient to stand for cheap interest as a political theory, Congress has refused to act and put over consideration at the very time when the Treasury is in desperate need of a more flexible approach to its money problems.

Statute puts a 4¼-percent top on the interest that can be paid on Government bonds maturing in 5 years or more. On short-term bonds or notes, there is only the ceiling imposed by the market place. As a consequence, the Treasury is forced continually to float short-term issues, since the long-term issues cannot compete with other bonds. You can't force people to buy Government bonds when their money can get better wages elsewhere.

To sell its short-term paper, the Government allows whatever interest the market commands. So the Treasury is actually paying out more for interest than it would if Congress permitted it a competitive position in long-term bonds, and, in addition, has the costly job of frequent rollover of the debt. In short, it is in continuous process of issuing new short-term paper to meet the maturity of other short-term paper.

The average investor doesn't want to have to keep converting his bonds or notes every 90 or 180 days. So the banks are the chief investors in short-term paper, almost to the point of being drafted. The result is an inflationary gimmick built right into the banking system. The public, which would welcome long-term Government bonds at a realistic rate of interest, lets Government paper alone and goes in for industrials, utilities, or municipals.

The public market for new Government bonds of larger denominations—leaving out E and H bonds—is practically nonexistent at the present time. Meanwhile, the decline in E and H bonds sales, and the high rate of redemptions, show that even this market has been affected by the failure of the Government to keep its interest payments on a realistic basis. This small investor market can get better wages for its money, too.

This embarrassment to the Treasury Department has been patiently pointed out to Congress by both the President and Secretary Anderson. And it is, indeed, more than an embarrassment; it is a fiscal peril. But Congress, still befogged by the old shibboleth of cheap interest, merely shrugs its shoulder, and, like Micawber, waits for something to turn up.

[From the Wichita Eagle, Sept. 1, 1959]

INTEREST RATES AND SPECIAL SESSION

Chances of a special session of Congress are based on the possibility that that body will take no action on raising the interest ceiling for Government obligations, as the President has requested. As matters stand, management of the national debt is described by those in charge of it as almost inconceivably difficult.

The ceiling on Government securities, enacted in 1918 in connection with World War I finance, is 4¼ percent. That has become unrealistic in view of competition for lendable funds.

The Treasury is assigned the task of raising billions to meet constantly maturing obligations and to obtain new money for appropriations voted by Congress which are not covered by taxes.

The best way to borrow this money is from the private savings of the American people. The Government sells the people long-term securities without inflationary effects. When such paper can't be sold, the Government competes for short-term borrowings against many demands. This competition already has driven interest rates sharply upward. Sale of Government short-term paper involves bank borrowings creating new credit and expanding the money supply. That has inflationary implications.

Present interest rate on E and H bonds to small investors is 3¼ percent. Private institutions seeking this money pay higher interest rates. The President would raise this rate so as to make such investment more attractive and add to the $50.5 billion now outstanding.

Congress either will act to meet the Treasury's pressing need for longer term, noninflationary borrowing or it will be called back to reconsider. Getting the national debt on a more manageable basis is of the utmost concern to the future of every American citizen.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal, Aug. 25, 1959]

BLOATED BONDHOLDER A DURABLE GHOST

On August 12 President Eisenhower listed some of the things he hopes Congress will do before its present rapidly waning session ends. First of all he put an upward adjustment of the interest rate ceilings on Government securities. The House Ways and Means Committee had that same day approved a bill granting that authority to the Treasury.

However, last week the committee—or, for practical purposes, the Democratic majority in the committee—reversed itself, and put the President's request on the shelf, or in effect denied it for the present session. The committee's action demonstrated that not only the President but also Congress possesses a power of veto. Mr. Eisenhower, who has brandished his own veto club rather provocatively, may need a civics lesson. Even so, this was expensive and reckless pedagogy.

However, what probably influenced the Democrats more than a desire to educate Mr. Eisenhower was the psychology indicated by the old-fashioned term "bloated bondholder"—a favorite in the political oratory of earlier and simpler times. The term has become obsolete, so far as we know, but evidently the bondholder is still bloated in many minds.

But suppose that he still were vastly bloated—and he, in the case of Government securities, is usually not an individual but a bank, insurance company or other institution holding funds in trust—he will not be unbloated by refusing to let the Government pay higher interest rates. He will simply be inclined to find other and more profitable places in which to invest the funds which he has or which are entrusted to him. In short, Uncle Sam is at disadvantage when he goes to the money market, and is compelled to resort to devices costly to the taxpayer.

The Democrats may not be moved by the serious difficulty in which the present interest rate ceilings put Treasury Secretary Anderson. But have they given up hope that the next Treasury Secretary may be one of their own?

[From the Rockford (Ill.) Register-Republic, Aug. 28, 1959]

EVERYONE AFFECTED

Both President Eisenhower and Treasury Secretary Anderson this week have renewed their requests that Congress take action on legislation to remove the interest rate on long-term Government bonds. Secretary Anderson says that inflationary pressures build up when the Treasury must sell short-term bonds in heavy amounts and pay the highest interest on these notes since the 1920's.

The House Ways and Means Committee, on an almost straight party-line vote, last week shelved the higher-interest bill. There is some indication that the Democratic majority in Congress might agree to higher interest on Government savings bonds. That adjustment is also needed, but Congress should not ignore the long-term bond issue question because all Government financing is interrelated.

The Treasury Secretary points out that raising the interest rate would reduce fears of inflation, which by itself shoots up the rate. Anderson says it is impossible to build up a surplus and reduce the national debt when the Treasury must pay unrealistic interest rates.

The average taxpayer, hoping for eventual relief from the burden he shoulders, will benefit if the Government's cost of borrowing money can be held down. If the Treasury can borrow more money on a long-term basis, it will not pay as much interest in the aggregate as it would by having to issue notes frequently for 90-day and 180-day periods. The fight for reasonable interest rates is thus of importance to every individual and not merely to investors who lend money to the Government.

Baltimore Sun, June 2, 1959: "Senator JOHNSON * * * pointed out that in the single showdown in which high interest rates had been at issue, the Senate majority, including a majority of Democrats, had voted to pay the rates demanded by the market. The pending bill had been a GI housing measure." * * *

New York Times, June 4, 1959: "There could be serious trouble if the Government is foreclosed indefinitely from selling any security longer than 5 years to maturity."

Associated Press Business News Analyst Sam Dawson has written, June 5, 1959: "If the Treasury could sell more long-term bonds to investors and more U.S. savings bonds to individuals, it would tend to dampen the fires of inflation, since such money wouldn't be breeding new credit, as short-term Treasury bills do."

Baltimore Sun: "The Government has got to offer advantages or it just isn't going to get the lender's money. That is precisely the fix in which the Government now finds itself * * *. The alternative is some kind of strong-arm action comparable to a kingly commandeering of private property."

Wall Street Journal: "So just what kind of fix do these Democratic Congressman think the U.S. Treasury will be in if it is prohibited from paying more than 4.25 percent interest in a market that has a higher interest rate? It will be in the fix it is now in, only more so."

Baltimore Sun, June 8, 1959: "Senator DOUGLAS said this: 'I believe in a competitive interest rate. I do not believe the Government should artificially lower the interest rate.' Without such flexibility, the Treasury will be forced to adopt inflationary expedients and the soundness of the dollar will be even more seriously threatened than it is."

New York Journal of Commerce: "A ceiling on borrowing cost can accomplish very little. * * * it would be extremely unfortunate for the economy if the Treasury had to continue to rely on the short-term securities with their inflationary effects just because the Congress adjourned without raising an interest ceiling that could be called at best an artificial barrier."

St. Louis Post Dispatch, June 9, 1959: "As with the ancient dream of eating one's cake and having it too, the hope of simultaneously enjoying the best of two possible worlds has a strong grip on some Senators and Representatives. They would like to enjoy both the full employment of boom times and the low interest rates of depression times. Who wouldn't? * * * What are the alternatives? The Federal Reserve System might be ordered to support the price of Government bonds, as it did during and after the war. But this is a proved way of creating inflationary pressures, since every dollar thus put into support buying adds something like $6 to the money supply."

Wall Street Journal: "Today when any man throws bricks at the hardhearted advocates of hard money, he is in reality smashing the hopes of the common man and the dream of security in the pension society."

J. A. Livingston in Washington Post and Times Herald, June 10, 1959: "Congress has no alternative. It must grant Secretary Anderson freedom to finance in the open market. It will have to raise the interest ceiling on bonds above 4¼ percent—in case he has to use it. Anderson's fix is everybody's fix."

Paul Heffernan in New York Times, June 14, 1959: "President Eisenhower's proposals for raising the Federal debt limit and removing the ceiling on interest rates of Treasury bonds are viewed in the financial district as necessary moves for putting the Government's financial affairs in an up-to-date framework."

New York Times: "The ultimate effect of the ceiling's removal, declared Martin * * * would be not only to lessen the pressures that are pushing interest rates up, but to reassure savers as to the future value of the money they have put into interest-bearing investments."

Kansas City Star, June 15, 1959: "The dollar has been regarded throughout the world as a symbol of U.S. prestige and strength. We do not suggest, nor did Secretary Anderson, that other nations have already lost faith in either the dollar or in our Government. But it is only realistic to admit that because of our inflationary and fiscal difficulties, they are watching more closely than ever before."

Washington Daily News, June 16, 1959: "Under present market conditions * * *. To get the money, the Treasury must resort to short-term bond issues * * *. But the repeated marketing of these short-term issues is expensive. Furthermore it unnecessarily disturbs the credit market where expanding industry also must go for funds * * *. The Democratic Advisory Council termed removal of the interest ceiling 'indefensible.' It said the action would have 'a damaging effect on small borrowers, States, municipalities, and homemakers.' It need have no such effect."

Wall Street Journal, June 17, 1959: "The past few days have brought into the open an attitude on the part of a number of influential lawmakers that is both disturbing and dangerous. This is an evident desire to return the Federal Reserve System to the business of pegging the Government bond market."

Wall Street Journal, June 22, 1959: "Thus it is quite possible that if the Government is forced, by a refusal of Congress to remove the ceiling, into nothing but short-term financing, its interest rate expense will become high rather than low."

Baltimore Sun, June 25, 1959: "The Democrats—in sharp contrast to the Republican minority on the Ways and Means Committee—haven't any well-formulated, concrete alternative proposal to offer the Treasury. * * * What the Democrats fear is that if they flatly brushed the President's interest proposal aside and drove the Treasury into the short-term market interest rates may go on rising anyhow. And thus in the coming Presidential year they conceivably could be left with a woeful political headache on their hands: How to explain to the voters that they failed to stop interest from rising while forcing the Treasury to resort to inflationary short-term financing and a concomitant rise in living costs * * *. Some Congressmen have been told by the Treasury 'if you force us into the short-term market exclusively, you'll probably find the cost of the national debt rising even more than it has already risen.'"

J. A. Livingston in Philadelphia Bulletin, July 1, 1959: "First, Congress votes authority to the Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson to increase the public debt from $285 billion to $295 billion. Then it fusses and fumes over the request to eliminate the interest rate ceiling of 4¼ percent on marketable bonds and 3.26 percent on savings bonds. How fit for a nursery rhyme:

"Congress, may I go into debt?
Yes, Bob, name a target;
Borrow whatever you have to get,
But don't send 'bonds to market.'"

New York Times: "It is difficult to imagine that in a final showdown a majority of the Members of Congress, acting out of ignorance or ancient prejudice or pure partisan politics, should act to hamstring the Treasury * * *. Passage of this legislation is a difficult thing to ask of the Democratic leadership, but the very essence of leadership is assumption of responsibility on the tough ones."

Wall Street Journal, July 3, 1959: "Despite the political attractiveness of shifting any onus from Congress to the White House, these men apparently felt it was too inconsistent with their 'liberal' reputations to do anything at all that might possibly seem to be for higher interest rates. So now all is in suspense while they try to work themselves out of their self-created dilemma."

Philadelphia Evening Bulletin (editorial titled "Sneaky Inflation"), July 6, 1959: "Nobody is for inflation so long as it is called by its right name. But let it be called 'expansion of the economy.' Or 'hold down the interest rates.' Or 'No bonus for bankers.' Then it's a different story. A great many people will enthusiastically back any of these appeals, happily unaware that they are helping to bring about the very thing they dread."

Wall Street Journal, July 10, 1959: "The implication is that the legal right to pay the market price for money is a sort of favor granted the President instead of being the only practical thing the U.S. Treasury, like any other borrower, can do."

New York Herald Tribune: "The House Ways and Means Committee * * * has coupled its action with a potentially damaging assault on the independence of the Federal Reserve Board."

Nat S. Finney in Buffalo Evening News, July 11, 1959: "Americans who buy on the time payment plan or have to borrow to tide themselves over 6-month emergencies will 'pay through the nose' if Congress refuses to remove a 30-year-old interest rate ceiling on longer term Federal bonds."

Washington Star: "When the Treasury Department announced this week that it would pay a near-record 4.728 percent interest rate on a $2 billion issue of 1-year, or short-term bills it was not 'setting' the highest rate in 38 years for the benefit of the Nation's bankers. Instead, it was borrowing money at the lowest price it could find—by competitive bidding in a free market that is governed by the nonpolitical law of supply and demand * * *. It is clearly 'in the national interest' for the Treasury to have greater flexibility in its debt management."

Harold B. Dorsey in Washington Post and Times Herald, July 13, 1959: "Of at least equal importance is the fact that the Treasury Department's demand for credit in the short-term market is making it more expensive and more difficult to finance the normal operations of business. Some of those who oppose lifting the interest rate ceiling on Government bonds are inconsistently in favor of cheap credit for individuals and small businesses. They would force the Government to compete with these individuals and small businesses for the available supply of short-term credit. The natural effect is a higher interest rate for everybody in the short-term and intermediate-term credit markets."

New York Times, July 15, 1959: "Is there a relatively painless way by which the Treasury could sell more long-term bonds without paying higher interest rates? Are there devices by which the Federal Reserve System, without pumping up the Nation's bank reserves and money supply to inflationary proportions, could help solve the Treasury's problem? A number of Democrats in Congress think the answer to both those questions is "Yes" * * *. The idea is to have the Federal Reserve buy Treasury bonds from time to time, which it does not now do, while still fulfilling its 'primary mission' of a sound monetary policy. This is to be the painless cure for the debt-management problem * * *. There is no easy way to beat inflation and still keep interest rates low at a time of boom in the economy. The Ways and Means Committee would do well to recognize that fact and strike the amendment from the bill."

The Washington Daily News, July 20, 1959: "Funny money is the problem in congressional maneuvering over interest rates. An insistent minority would run the printing presses to pay the Government's bills. * * * Present high living costs * * * are substantially the result of their work. * * * The printing press influence is obvious in the Ways and Means Committee suggestion * * *. Any such "sense of Congress" as is proposed wolud advertise to the world that we haven't learned our lesson * * *. We hope that, whatever else Congress may choose to do about interest rates, it will eliminate this inflationary advice to the Federal Reserve."

Baltimore Sun, July 25, 1959: "The present management of the Federal Reserve System is very much against trafficking in Federal bonds * * *. The Government's credit is measured in the ultimate by its bonds. For the Federal Reserve to buy these bonds would, the Reserve feels, inject artificial and distorting pressures into the market. * * * The Federal Reserve System's resistance is clearly on a keep-the-camel's-nose-out-of-the-tent basis."

J. A. Livingston in Washington Post, Philadelphia Bulletin, and other newspapers, July 26, 1959: "Both the Reserve Board and Secretary of the Treasury Anderson consider the amendment misleading and inflationary. It implies that the Reserve will become a backdoor printing press for the Treasury. The vote on this will disclose the inflation and anti-inflation lineup in Congress.

The New York Times, July 27, 1959: "The independence of the Federal Reserve System, for example, is a far more vital issue than a change in the Government bond ceiling that could well prove of theoretical more than practical significance. There are other fiscal and monetary issues that are more important.

"It is to be hoped that the administration in seeking to end the illogical interest rate ceiling on Government bond offerings, will not be willing to pay to high a price for something that promises to have limited practical value, at most, all this time."

The Journal of Commerce, August 7, 1959: "The current pattern of savings in the Nation tells more about why interest rates are high than do all the speeches in Congress criticising tight money * * *. The only way to lower interest rates in a market for money, controlled by supply and demand factors, is for the Congress to practice fiscal discipline, giving an indication through its spending and taxing policies that it is seriously interested in defending the value of the dollar."

The Houston Post, August 12, 1959: "President Eisenhower and Secretary Anderson have put before Congress the only positive proposals to ease debt management worries and curb inflation. In the absence of alternates, it would appear that Congress must act to maintain confidence in the dollar."

New York Herald Tribune, August 19, 1959: "From the start congressional Democrats have treated the interest rate issue as a political football, hoping to use it as a means of pinning on the Republicans a phony 'high interest party' label. Without freedom to adjust to these forces (of a free market) the Treasury hasn't the means to manage the national debt soundly. Yesterday's action was not only fiscally imprudent but politically irresponsible."

Wall Street Journal, August 20, 1959: "The Ways and Means Committee * * * seems to share the * * * view that if you just won't think about unpleasant things they'll somehow go away * * *. The public market for new Government bonds of larger denominations is for all practical purposes now nonexistent * * *. Well, the Treasury can try to do what it has been doing, juggle its short-term debts in air in the hopes it can keep them there. But in a year's time, when the committee may again 'think about it,' that problem will be far worse * * *. Irresponsibility may be charming in a minx, but not in grown men. And even Scarlett O'Hara found out, in the end, that tomorrow was too late."

Washington News, August 26, 1959: "President Eisenhower did a first-class job in telling Congress why repeal of the 41-year-old ceiling on interest rates for long-term Government securities is so important to American pocketbooks. If Congress doesn't drop its purely political aversion to this proposal, the country is headed for another round of inflation."

New York Times, August 27, 1959: "The ceiling on marketable securities * * * is in the nature of an anachronistic accident. It has no logical relationship to present conditions in the bond market."

Wall Street Journal: "Every man knows there are sensible and foolish ways of managing the burden of debt. And only an irresponsible Congress will force the Nation of which it is caretaker further along the ways of folly."

New York Herald Tribune: "The same lawmakers who voted to raise the mortgage ceilings are refusing to grant the President's request for authority to sell bonds paying more than 4¼ percent."

MONEY MANAGERS HIT A ROADBLOCK—TREASURY IS FORCED BACK INTO SHORT-TERM MARKET FOR NEW BORROWING—$5 TO $7 MILLION NEEDED, BUT THE SALE OF BONDS WITH LONG MATURITIES IS BARRED BY INTEREST CEILING

(By Paul Heffernan)

If a man made $7,000 a year and owed about $29,000, of which $5,000 was payable on demand and $7,500 more within a year, he would know what it's like to be Uncle Sam. The difference is seven zeros at the end of the dollar sign.

An ordinary citizen in such a fix would first of all try to keep happy those creditors who held the demand debt so that they would not descend on him all at once with an order to shell out 70 percent of his year's salary. Next, he would persuade the other short-term creditors to give up their 1-year call on his salary for a repayment scheme that would give him 10 years or more to work out of the debt.

Not so with Uncle Sam, however. Instead of trying to wriggle out of the money pickle, the Government is getting ready to go even deeper into short-term debt. Before the year is out, the tax-poor Treasury wll have to borrow $5 billion to $7 billion in fresh cash. Much of the job will be done next month.

LONG ISSUES BLOCKED

The money will have to be borrowed at short term because Congress will not permit the Treasury to sell long-term securities (issues with a life of more than 5 years) at an interest rate higher than 4¼ percent, a ceiling enacted by a World War I Congress and since maintained.

Until about a month ago it was debatable whether the Treasury might still be able to raise long-term money at the 4¼-percent limit ordained 40 years ago. There is no question now, however. The economy's persisting vigor is making loan money scarce, a story that the bond market has been unfolding the last 2 weeks in the form of rising investment yields.

The Treasury's 14 outstanding issues of marketable long-term bonds—issues maturing from 1965 to 1995—are selling in the market at prices yielding 4.15 to 4.79 percent, except the 3s of 1995, which, because of special tax considerations, yield about 3.9 percent to maturity. Under such conditions, the Treasury could hardly expect to borrow much long-term money at a cost of less than 4½ to 4¾ percent. Within a few months, if economic conditions do not slacken materially, the rate might be 5 percent.

PIVOTAL CREDITORS

Who are the investors who hold $50 billion of payable-on-demand debt over the head of the Treasury? Who are the holders of $75 billion of other debt due within a year? Are there signs that investors are getting indifferent about holding so much of the floating public debt and would rather put the money to other use?

The answers are sobering.

The Treasury's demand creditors are the people who own savings bonds, issues slated to mature over 10 years or so from issuance, yet nevertheless subject to redemption at the holder's option on demand. Statistics show that such people are becoming increasingly reluctant to hold the bonds. Sales are falling off and cash-ins are mounting. In July, for instance, there were nearly twice as many savings bonds turned in for redemption as there were new bonds sold.

Congress last week took a belated step to make the savings bonds more attractive to holders. It approved a bill to raise the interest yield on the savings bonds, if held to maturity, from 3¼ percent to 3¾ percent.

The congressional move should go far toward arresting the growing unpopularity of the savings bonds if the indifference of the public is due mainly to a rate of return that is no longer competitive with yields from insured savings accounts in banks and savings and loan associations and other comparable investments of conservative, yet liquid, kind.

The switching out of savings bonds, may be the result not merely of resentment against a starvation return on savings. In part, the cash-ins may mark a basic revulsion from the savings propensity in favor of spending or risky speculation. Here lies the great danger to the Treasury.

So long as savers have confidence in the worth of their Nation's money, they are not likely to be overcritical of the yield on a Government savings bond, a special investment that smacks both of immediate self-interest and patriotism. But once small investors are carried away by the urge to build or maintain estates by the purchase of speculative equities, no force short of an emergency state decree would be able to stop the avalanche of savings bond turn-ins.

The problem posed by the $75 billion of other Government floating debt is perhaps even more delicate. By far the greater part of this debt is held by the Nation's large corporations, in lieu of petty cash.

Of the $75 billion of Treasury debt held within a year, about half represents discount bills due in a week to 10 months. There has been a significant rise in the market yields on the bills over the past month. Most of the bills outstanding now yield more than 4 percent. This bespeaks two forces.

One force is swelling supply. The Treasury, facing an ever-narrowing field in which to raise money, is turning more and more to the discount bills.

The other force is receding demand. During most of the summer it was an open question as to whether the big corporations that hold the greater part of the $37,500 million bill debt would continue to be willing investors. Recent weeks suggest the answer.

The corporations are not bidding in the Treasury market as eagerly for the bills as they used to. The big companies are moving into the period of the year when inventories tend to rise. The money on loan to the Treasury in part is being switched back into the business. Besides, profits are slowing up and free cash is shrinking.

In such a pass, the luxury of carrying more than 40 percent of the public debt in the form of demand or short-dated securities is sure to exact from Uncle Sam an uncomfortable price. Probably Congress will have to see it to believe. The wait may not be long.

BIG TRADE DEFICIT IS SPARKING MOVE TO CUT AID FUNDS—UNITED STATES WORRIED BY DECREASE IN GOLD STOCKPILE AND RISE IN FOREIGN ASSETS HERE

(By Edwin L. Dale, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, September 5.—The big deficit in the U.S. balance of international payments, with its resulting outflow of gold and buildup of foreign assets in New York, has begun to have a major impact on administration thinking about foreign aid.

Powerful voices, centering in financial agencies, have begun to argue that the flow of Government capital abroad in the form of aid is too large for the continued strength of the dollar.

The underlying belief in top administration financial circles is that there is an entirely new situation in the world economy, with European currencies gaining strength while the dollar is showing the first faint signs of vulnerability.

EMOTIONS IN CONFLICT

The immediate results of this view came in President Eisenhower's trip to Europe, during which he urged that European nations undertake a far greater share of the burden of helping underdeveloped countries.

In a sense, the administration is torn between two powerful emotions. One stems from acceptance of the basic idea that the underdeveloped countries must be helped in the interest of the United States as well as for the good of those nations that get aid.

The other is a growing fear for the future stability of the dollar unless two related things happen: domestic finances are controlled and the balance of international transactions is righted. The U.S. deficit in international transactions was $3,400 million last year and will probably be even larger this year.

FUTURE SEEMS GLOOMY

As financial officials see the situation, it will do no good to anyone if there is a larger outflow of aid dollars but the dollar becomes of dubious value. This could happen, it is believed, if U.S. payments deficits continue on a large scale for many more years.

Such a deficit means that foreign countries as a whole obtain more dollars than they spend to buy American goods. They can take the difference in gold or can keep it in dollars and invest them in the financial markets in New York. These invested dollars are potential claims against gold. Already they total $15,651 million not far below the gold reserve, which has dwindled to $19,524 million.

As the claims grow and the gold stock declines, U.S. short-term liabilities might eventually exceed assets. Even that would not necessarily mean a run on gold or some other crisis. But U.S. officials do not like to contemplate even the remotest possibility of such an event.

Besides, some of them, looking ahead, are unhappy at the thought of potential pressure on the United States from what, in effect, would be its foreign creditors. The United States, which has been exerting the pressure for years, does not want to be on the receiving end.

Foreign countries are already substantial creditors of the U.S. Government. They have invested about $6,200 million in New York in short-term Government securities. Thus, as one high official put it, "we're borrowing short from foreigners at home and lending abroad long."

The recent deterioration in the U.S. balance of payments has come about mainly because of a drop in exports and a rise in imports, not because of an increase in foreign aid. But as financial officials view the situation, foreign aid is the one element in the total balance over which the Government has considerable control.

It is regarded as certain that the new line of thought in the administration will be a major theme in conversations with foreign Finance Ministers at the annual meeting here later this month of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

European countries have been running strong surpluses in their balance of payments while the United States has been in deficit. To U.S. officials this means only one thing: Europe should become a much bigger exporter of capital and the United States a smaller one.

NEW VIEW ON INVESTMENTS

Officials worried about international payments deficit are even beginning to take a less enthusiastic view of investment abroad by American business. Up until very recently, this was welcomed on every count, by conservatives and liberals alike.

Now, with the payments deficit uppermost in many minds, an investment abroad is frequently seen as a double blow—first, an immediate outflow of dollars; and, second, a probable setback to American exports. The export loss occurs when an American manufacturer, for example, builds a plant in Europe to share in the Common Market rather than try to sell goods made in the United States.

This feeling accounts for the Treasury's opposition to a bill to provide new tax incentives for foreign investment unless its benefits are limited to investments in underdeveloped countries.

A reflection of the growing concern about the international payments position of the United States came in the administration position on the Development Loan Fund in the foreign-aid bill. The President refused to support a Senate move to put the Fund's financing on a long-term basis, increase its lending authority and get around the Appropriations Committees, even though the President's original position backed all three ideas.

Another reflection of the new line of thought, paradoxically, is U.S. support for the new International Development Association, even though this will cost the United States $330 million. Such a new institution has several merits in the eyes of an official worried about the U.S. payments deficit and the problem of the underdeveloped countries.

It puts Europe in the lending picture for the first time on a formal, multilateral scale.

Because it will be equipped to make "soft" loans—loans with easy terms and repayable in the currency of the borrower—it should eventually ease the pressure for a larger and larger Development Loan Fund in the United States. The Loan Fund also makes this type of loan.

LEGISLATORS HURT THOSE THEY PROFESS TO PROTECT

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

The penalty of financial stringency imposed upon millions of small businesses and individual borrowers was symbolized last week by the increase from 4½ to 5 percent in the interest rates which commercial banks charge their "prime" customers. The interest rate charged for money loaned by the banks to other borrowers will not scale upward from 5 instead of from 4½ percent.

There can be little doubt that the failure of Congress to pass legislation that would permit more flexibility to the Treasury Department in its financial operations is closely associated with the rising interest rates. As prospects for this legislation diminished there seemed to be a corollary increase in interest rates. Then when it was announced that the House Ways and Means Committee had pigeonholed this legislation for the balance of the session, interest rates rose sharply.

On Monday of last week the Treasury Department had to pay the highest interest rate for its 91-day borrowings since the bank holiday in March, 1933. And Government bond prices declined again to the lowest levels since the early 1930's. The interest yield for most outstanding Government bonds is now well in excess of the 4¼ percent ceiling which Congress has refused to lift.

Only a few months ago it was considered to be only a fantastic possibility that Congress might force the Treasury Department to borrow all of its money in the short-term and intermediate-term market. Now that the fantasy seems to have become a fact, it is clear that this competition of the Government for short-term credit, in competition with all of the other kinds of borrowers, is causing an extremely tight credit situation.

One might logically ask: Why has there been so much weakness in market prices for longer term Government bonds? The answer is that the congressional attitude on this subject strongly suggests encouragement for inflation. Few lenders want to lend their money for a long period of time if there is such a clear threat that they are going to be paid back in depreciated dollars.

At any rate, we stand today with some of these financial factors in an unusually critical condition. Furthermore, the arithmetic suggests that this condition is going to get worse between now and the end of the year. The Treasury Department has $8.9 billion of debt maturing in November to refinance and it has to raise several billions of dollars of new cash in the next few months. This substantial demand for credit has been forced into the short-term credit market.

In addition, many businesses have to increase their borrowing between now and the end of the year to carry harvests and to carry their Christmas inventories. More bank credit will be needed after the steel strike has been settled to finance the anticipated snapback in business activity.

When we pile these additional demands for credit on top of the present unusually tight situation, we do not end up with a very pretty picture. Somebody is going to get hurt. In the first place, the implied inability of small business people to borrow money for their seasonal needs is a painful matter. In addition, millions of people who borrow for their personal needs are being forced to pay higher interest rates—if they can find the credit at any interest rate.

And as if that were not enough damage, all of the rest of us are being penalized by the needlessly higher interest rates which our Government is having to pay for its borrowed money.

It is very difficult to understand why Congress has not been able to recognize these painful effects that are resulting from their amateurish efforts to tamper with the Nation's delicate credit mechanism. Is it possible that those Congressmen who are blocking the legislation to give the Treasury Department more flexibility fail to comprehend the painful effects of their inaction? If they had not been able to anticipate that their inaction would cause the Treasury Department to pay the highest interest rate on its borrowings since the bank holiday 26 years ago, then all they have to do now is look in the newspapers and find that that is the fact. If they had been advised that this kind of thing could not happen, then they should, at least belatedly, recognize the ignorance of their advisers. The facts that have already been developed prove that ignorance.

The weird part of this whole thing is that the suffering is most serious for the millions of people whom these Congressmen profess to be protecting, while it is helping the profits of the comparatively few for whom numerous Congressmen have frequently expressed criticism—the bankers. Even the latter realize that they will ultimately suffer by the distress that is being imposed on all of the others.

EXHIBIT 5

HOW BOND RATES AFFECT YOU

Nobody in his right mind thinks that Congress would ever imperil the national defense by refusing to pay the Pentagon's bills. And if it did so there would be such an outburst of indignation that Congress would get cracking.

But the reverse of this is happening. The management of the public debt is also of vital concern. Yet Congress is refusing to give the Treasury the powers it needs to manage the public debt in a sound and orderly way. There has been no outburst of public indignation because the issue is difficult for laymen to grasp.

They had better grasp it, for it affects the value of their savings and the security of their future. By its failure to act, Congress is driving up interest rates and adding to inflationary pressures. Here are the simple facts:

The dead hand of the past—a World War I measure passed in 1918—puts a ceiling of 4¼ percent on long-term Government bonds and savings bonds. It is these bonds, bought by insurance companies, trust funds and the savings of individuals, which should carry as much as possible of the public debt because they check inflation by taking savings out of the scramble for goods.

This 41-year-old ceiling on bond interest makes it increasingly harder for the Treasury to sell new bonds. Institutions and individuals, since they can get better rates from other securities, refuse to buy them. Since 1946, for example, life insurance companies have reduced their holdings of Government bonds from 45 percent of their assets to a mere 7 percent. Many individuals cash in their savings bonds.

Instead of putting out long-term bonds with interest rates high enough to make them marketable, the Treasury has been forced to raise the needed money by "short-term paper" (e.g., 91-day notes), which are bought chiefly by commercial banks. Since they are virtually the same thing as cash, these notes can be used by the banks to expand their loans. They can lend $5 of new money for each $1 of Treasury notes they own. This has an immediate inflationary effect.

Furthermore, this "monetizing" of the debt tends to drive up interest rates as the Government competes with other borrowers for scarce money. In the last fortnight, for example, the rate on 91-day notes has just risen to 3.8 percent, the highest level since the bank crisis of 1933. If this trend continues, even short-term interest rates may soon exceed the 4¼ percent ceiling on long-term bonds. This freakish result is made more likely by Speaker RAYBURN's announcement last week that Congress won't act this year on the President's reiterated request for lifting the interest ceiling. Such inaction undermines the dollar by raising doubts abroad as to its soundness and damages the Government's credit, just as it does the economy itself.

Some leaders are urging the President, on his return, to take the issue to the voters as he did on labor reform. If Congress adjourns without action, the President may call it back in special session. But voters themselves can help speed the necessary action by letting their Congressmen know that they back the President. He has stated the issue very clearly:

"The vital interests of all Americans are at stake because excessive reliance on short-term financing can have grave consequences for the purchasing power of the dollar * * *. Let me state as plainly as I can that this is not legislation to increase interest rates * * *. We always seek to borrow as cheaply as we can * * *. To prohibit the Treasury from paying the market price for long-term money is just as impracticable as telling the Defense Department that it cannot pay the fair market price for a piece of equipment. The result would be the same in either case: the Government could not get what it needs."

THE FUTURE OF THE DOLLAR

(By Dr. Wilhelm Vocke,[1] former president of the Bank deutscher Länder, now the Deutsche Bundesbank, the central bank of the Federal Republic of Germany)

You have invited me to discuss with you the problem of the dollar, which is a task that I approach with some hesitation since it concerns, after all, your country. Yet the issues that are involved clearly reach beyond national frontiers and indeed affect the world as a whole. There would be little value in my joining this debate on monetary problems if I thought the world were headed toward another war. But I firmly believe in peace—many years of peace; and I am convinced that the United States can promote peace most effectively not only through the power of its armaments, but through the strength of its financial system as well.

The current debate over the future of the dollar and economic growth has advanced to the stage where the issues are now clearly drawn. The choice is between the path of creeping inflation and that of a strong and stable dollar. A clear decision as to which path is to be taken must be made now in the interest of the business community and the nation, which must know the direction in which the economy is moving and how much trust can be placed in the currency. Things cannot be permitted to drift, creating uncertainty and confusion among long-term investors who must plan ahead and on whose appraisal of the future the economic growth of the country depends.

THE LESSONS OF THE GERMAN EXPERIENCE

Let me first make a few observations on the German monetary experience, from which some fundamental lessons can be drawn. When I assumed office as president of the bank deutscher Länder 10 years ago, monetary conditions in Germany were in a desperate state. Several experts, both German and foreign, with worldwide reputation and extensive experience declared frankly that the deutsche mark had virtually no prospects of ever becoming a hard currency. That these well-meant opinions proved wrong, as time has shown, is no doubt in part due to a good deal of luck and favorable circumstances. But I, for one, never wavered in my conviction that a monetary policy, consistently and energetically pursued in order to establish and maintain a stable currency, must succeed.

There are perhaps two principal lessons to be learned from the German experience. The first is that currency stability can be achieved and preserved even under the most adverse circumstances. The second, and even more significant, is that a monetary policy, firmly committed to currency stability, not only does not conflict with a high rate of economic growth but indeed is essential to its achievement. Germany's remarkable economic recovery and expansion over the past decade was closely linked to the restoration and preservation of a strong and stable monetary unit.

Obviously, these policies did not escape the test of public opinion. In 1955 the German economy was unmistakably headed toward a dangerous boom. All economic indicators—production, employment, income, exports, and above all wages and prices—were surging upward at a high pitch. Under these conditions prompt and energetic measures by the central bank were called for, in order to keep the economy from losing balance. The steps taken to bridle the inflationary forces proved highly unpopular and were severely criticized by industrialists, government officials, and the public on the grounds that they would undermine economic growth. As matters turned out, none of the somber predictions came true. On the contrary, as a result of the early effort to defend the deutsche mark, the economy quickly regained both its equilibrium and the basis for continued expansion in an orderly manner. This experience proves that a central bank must be persistent and unruffled in its pursuit of a determined course of action, and must not shrink from occasionally taking unpopular measures if its obligations and responsibilities to the nation are to be properly fulfilled. In Germany, such monetary measures had to be taken on several occasions in the face of widespread criticism. But now that the economy is vigorously moving forward at a high level of prosperity and on the basis of a stable currency, what were once unpopular policies have now become the object of rather general praise.

[1] Condensation of remarks made in this country by Dr. Vocke on Apr. 13, 1959.

The experience in the rest of Western Europe has been much the same. Comprehensive monetary and fiscal measures have helped restore financial stability and have revitalized the economies. The United States may regard the accumulation of gold by these countries with mixed feelings, but the fact remains that the gold had to be earned by productive effort. After years of bitter experience with inflation, Western Europe has now turned to monetary stability. The rejection of policies leading to continual depreciation of the currency was dramatized last December when 13 European countries took steps to make their currencies fully convertible.

THE CREEPING INFLATION THESIS

To a foreigner it seems almost absurd that there should be certain quarters in the United States where inflation is tolerated or even recommended. Surely any price to be paid for inflation must be excessive, considering not only the adverse economic and social effects, but the irretrievable losses in national prestige it may entail. The path of inflation in the United States would not only mean the depreciation and ultimate devaluation of the dollar, but also an acute decline in the moral authority, power, and international stature of the United States. That there are close links binding a nation's prestige to its financial posture is evident from the manner in which the emergence of the deutsche mark as a sound and stable monetary unit has enhanced the stature of the new Western Germany in the family of nations.

The arguments advanced by the advocates of inflation must be earnestly and thoroughly considered. To begin with, the arguments set forth are, above all, political in character. The inflationists purport to show that inflation is an inevitable tide that can be stemmed only at the cost of economic progress. Consequently they say, the attitude toward inflation must be rendered more flexible, and economic doctrine and policy must be adapted to a new institutional setting instead of plodding along the old rut of a stable currency.

Certainly, the proponents of this thesis by no means favor galloping inflation, but only the mild, creeping kind. In fact, they would for the most part readily admit that even a moderate inflation entails certain evils. Nevertheless, they would argue also that, whatever these evils may be, they are far less serious or significant than the grave political repercussions bound to result from a policy that tolerates an impairment of full employment, however temporary. To the advocates of creeping inflation full employment and monetary stability are incompatible. And, if there exists a choice, the decision would have to be in favor of full employment, for political reasons. Superficially, at least, these arguments may appear more or less plausible, particularly since they rest on political considerations. Yet on closer examination their contradictory nature becomes self-evident.

Let us turn first to full employment. What does it mean and to what degree can it benefit the Nation and the economy? If full employment should mean that the labor force is occupied 100 percent, the law of supply and demand cannot function normally in the labor market, and there exists, in effect, a state of overemployment. Under such conditions, employers can expand output only by outbidding each other for the available work force and by drawing workers away from one another. Labor, in turn, is enabled virtually to dictate its own wages. Such a state of affairs clearly cannot be regarded as the desirable optimum for the Nation or the economy, either in its domestic or international aspects.

It is also evident that in a free economy the level of employment cannot be maintained constant to any greater degree than the level of production, consumption, investment, or trade. But, while it may not be possible to eliminate economic fluctuations entirely, the magnitude and duration of the cycles can be at least minimized. In this connection, one ought to bear in mind that, even at fairly high levels of prosperity, it is easier to influence or control the oscillations in employment and business activity than to bridle a cumulative inflation which must eventually lead to the proverbial bust. Nonetheless, the proponents of creeping inflation recommend yielding to overemployment, continually rising wages, and the price-wage spiral, while declaring at the same time that what they envisage is merely an inflation that crawls along at the leisurely rate of, say, 2 percent per annum. Let us examine how this invention will work.

THE CUMULATIVE PROCESS OF INFLATION

The initial phase of inflation has a certain appeal. Rising money income activates the economy like a breath of spring that brings out the blossoms everywhere. Industry invests and production expands; credit volume rises, with borrowers planning to repay loans in depreciated money as inflation progresses. Employment climbs, and for a considerable part of the population the standard of living actually increases as consumption moves up, while the incentives to save wane. All economic indexes surge upward, mutually reinforcing each other, and setting the inflationary spiral in motion. At this stage, and at this stage only, inflation finds many adherents. But this happy state is usually short lived and lasts only as long as some faith in the currency is still maintained. Even while this phase continues, an increasing segment of the population, dependent on fixed incomes, begins to feel the ruthless grip of the inflationary pressures.

The inflationists have a remedy at hand for the sectors that are squeezed between rising prices and lagging incomes: The escalator clause. This clause, which automatically links wages, salaries, and even some business transactions to the cost-of-living index or gold, was widely used in France, but with results that proved far from encouraging. In fact, the escalator clause is merely an illusion. As long as the depreciation of the currency is minor, the clause is not invoked. And when inflation progresses, it is satisfactory neither to income receivers nor to income payers; meanwhile the Government is forced to inflate to an ever greater extent, in order to compensate those groups that remain unsheltered by the index clause. More importantly, however, the escalator clause, in itself, officially discredits the currency and therefore intensifies inflation. Moreover, what it clearly reveals is that, once the currency no longer serves as a stable standard of value, a substitute must be found. Since stability is, after all, essential, the absurdity of abandoning a stable standard of value in the first place becomes patently obvious.

All the various adaptations, compensations, and adjustments to a rising price level may well be bearable as long as inflation remains within narrow limits. But the fact is that inflation is progressive and eventually becomes fullblown. That point is reached when the public begins to lose faith in the currency and the material-value psychosis spreads. The scramble for goods is matched only by the rush into equity investments, while the bond market sags. The damage that inflation inflicts on the market for fixed-interest securities eventually makes it virtually impossible for the Government to consolidate its short-term debt. For no one will acquire bonds when the money invested continually shrinks. The inevitable consequence is that the central bank will be asked to absorb the unmarketable public debt, which adds further fuel to the inflationary surge.

The reluctance to hold money or fixed-interest securities finds expression also in the rapid decline in savings. Wasteful consumption and misdirected investments suddenly become rational economic actions, compared with the foolishness of saving money that is rapidly becoming worthless. At this point the reckless spendthrifts and speculators are proved right and amass fortunes, while the honest, conscientious, and weak lose the little they have. As the process continues, customary standards of behavior are swept away and accepted moral attitudes are shattered. Soon everyone flees from the currency and joins in the furious dance of inflation, while the nation is rapidly moving to the brink of disaster.

The succession of events that I have just outlined would probably be considered a gross exaggeration by the proponents of creeping inflation. They would assert that the idea is not to let the inflation get out of hand, but to confine it to a delightful 2 percent per annum. How is this feat to be accomplished? Obviously, inflation cannot be kept automatically within prescribed limits. There is no stable coefficient of inflation. Once begun, inflation spreads like fire and feeds on itself. Moreover, even if a limited depreciation of the dollar is envisaged, the public will try to protect itself, and by doing so will inevitably accelerate the pace of the price rise. Stability of the rate of inflation is an illusion, for if the public knows there will be a creeping inflation of 2 percent per annum, then the 2 percent will be reached not at the end of the year, but at the beginning, and the pressure for inflation will mount.

Since inflation is not self-regulating, by what method would the advocates of creeping inflation confine it to the predetermined limits? One answer is by credit policy, including restrictions on the volume of borrowing and increases in the rediscount rate. But the applications of such measures would be precisely those which the inflationists had sought to avoid in the first place. This means, in effect, that, while the inflationist would not be prepared to sacrifice full employment to monetary stability, he would nevertheless be disposed to sacrifice it for the sake of keeping the rate of inflation within arbitrary limits. The contradictory nature of the creeping inflation thesis now becomes self-evident.

We may even go one step further. What is really meant by a 2-percent rate of inflation? If it refers to the average price level, and not to the prices of individual commodities, say, straw hats or the wages of particular workmen on the bench, then the statisticians may well find that, after they have assembled and averaged the prices of all the separate commodities, the actual rate of inflation has surpassed the stipulated maximum. The consequence might then be the application of an elaborate network of physical controls over individual prices and wages. Adoption of a policy that is defined in terms of hitting a rigid target for average prices greatly increases the chance of detailed regulation to assure its fulfilment. Such economic regimentation would severely shatter the foundations upon which this Nation was built and radically alter its way of life. Inflation inevitably breeds economic controls, regimentation, and moral corruption.

THE INTERNATIONAL ASPECT OF INFLATION

Let me now touch briefly on the international aspect of the creeping inflation thesis. During my years as president of the Bank Deutscher Länder, that institution accumulated and kept a considerable amount of dollar assets in this country as backing for the Deutsche mark. Other central banks did likewise. And today, foreign central banks alone hold almost $10 billion here as part of their international reserves. These substantial holdings reflect the confidence of the world in the strength and stability of the U.S. dollar. One should hasten to note, however, that this faith in the dollar is by no means unshakable, and developments affecting its future are closely watched abroad.

There can be little doubt that a green light for creeping inflation would entail grave international repercussions. Acceptance of the doctrine—which to me is virtually unthinkable—would severely undermine the position of the U.S. dollar and would set in motion forces leading to its rapid replacement by gold as an international standard and store of value. The evitable result would be a massive withdrawal of foreign dollar balances and heavy gold losses for the United States. Under these circumstances the question of raising the price of gold and hence the devaluation of the dollar would again arise. I have not discussed this issue here; suffice it to say, however, that there are few things that I would regard as more detrimental to the United States and to the world than an increase in the dollar price of gold.

For all the reasons stated nothing must be permitted to give the world the impression that the stability of the dollar is in doubt. For any action that might signify yielding to the inflation thesis would involve irretrievable losses to the United States and would inflict immeasurable damage to the international monetary mechanism.

CONCLUDING COMMENTS

As a final word I may ask what there is to be gained by setting free the forces of inflation, except a postponement of the unavoidable adjustments that every economy must make sooner or later. It is certainly easier and less painful to curb incipient inflation or moderate the magnitude and duration of economic fluctuations than to tame an inflation that has reached the stage where only drastic deflationary remedies can be administered to restore balance. The measures taken in the United States last year illustrate that recession need not turn into depression and can be shortlived even without turning on the engines of inflation. Inflation essentially means weakness and thus cannot furnish a sound or lasting basis for economic progress. It is the line of least resistance, and not the road to an effective solution of economic problems or to the realization of economic aspirations.

We are living in a critical period in which courageous decisions must be made in order to win the struggle for freedom. This struggle, however, cannot be successfully waged by yielding to the disease of inflation, whether creeping, crawling, or any other kind.

The United States need not fall victim to the grip of inflation if that be the Nation's firm will. But any wavering in the determination to preserve the strength and stability of the dollar may lose the battle before it is even begun. I am confident that the underlying beliefs and traditions of this country are strong enough to give unhesitating expression to the will to preserve monetary stability on which much of the power and moral authority of the Nation rest.

The words of President Eisenhower and the firm attitude of the Federal Reserve System leave no doubt that the right choice is being made. This should be recognized throughout the world. And, as the specter of inflation is dispelled, the future of the dollar as the world's best monetary unit continues to be assured. One of the qualities that has rendered this country strong and powerful has been commonsense. If commonsense is to continue to guide American policies, the stability of the dollar cannot be in doubt.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that at least some interest rates are at a 20- or 25-year high. I noticed in the Wall Street Journal this morning that the Federal Reserve Board stated "Rise in Discount Rate To Fight Inflation, but Has Not Set Date." I presume that means they are going to pursue policies which in all sincerity they think will be desirable, but in my judgment will tend to result in higher interest rates.

Is it possible the high interest rates are likely to go down in the future or continue to rise?

Mr. BUSH. Do you mean interest rates generally?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Interest rates generally.

Mr. BUSH. I would say, as I did earlier, if business activity continues to expand and makes increasing demands upon the supply of savings available, it will have an upward pressure on interest rates.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Then the answer of the Senator from Connecticut is that interest rates are likely to continue to rise?

Mr. BUSH. I would say the Senator can draw that conclusion. I do not wish to haggle over words with him, but I say if we have a continuing increase in the rate of industrial activity and commercial activity, it would have a tendency to make more demand on savings that exist for lending purposes, and therefore it would be bound to exercise some upward pressure on interest rates. How far they would go or how much the interest rates would rise as a result I do not think I am in a position, nor is the Senator from Wisconsin, to guess. But there would be the tendency for interest rates to go up if the demand for money increases.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is my understanding that within the last couple of years the former Secretary of the Treasury George Humphrey testified interest rates have had a long-term trend to move downward. On the assumption that Mr. Humphrey is an extremely competent man, a man who was both a practical and a successful businessman and a man who had great experience as Secretary of the Treasury, I would assume this conclusion may be correct.

Mr. BUSH. Does the Senator wish me to comment on that?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes; I wish the Senator from Connecticut would.

Mr. BUSH. I am not familiar with that particular part of Mr. Humphrey's testimony, but in my lifetime I have seen interest rates go down. Following World War I when I made my first loan, it was at the rate of 6 percent, and that was a standard rate of interest at that time charged by the banks in the Middle West. I then lived in Columbus, Ohio.

Ten or fifteen years later one could borrow on a similar moderate risk at a rate of interest less than that—say 5 percent. I saw those interest rates go down so that one could borrow on a similar risk at around 4 percent or even less.

I say to the Senator from Wisconsin interest rates during my lifetime and since World War I have gone down. They went down with the depression. As business activity slackened off and the demand for money slackened off, interest rates went down.

They remained down until the beginning of World War II and then they were held down because controls were put on them as they were put on prices and wages. The Senator remembers that, though he was probably in the service at the time. They were artificially held down then. Since that time they have had a tendency to rise as industrial and commercial activity have placed increasing demand upon savings.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The reason I ask the Senator these questions is that experience over a lifetime suggests that interest rates, No. 1, have been tending to drop perhaps. I also suggest that they do fluctuate, and I also suggest that it might be very unwise fiscal management for the Treasury to make a commitment to pay more than 4¼ percent for long-term money, a commitment which they would have to honor 5 years from now, 10 years from now, or 15 years from now, no matter how low interest rates drop. They would still have to pay the 4½ percent, 5 percent or 5½ percent. They would commit themselves to buy in the event the amendment the Senator from Connecticut proposes were adopted.

Mr. BUSH. I say to the Senator there is nothing new about that. After World War II we had the Victory Loan. I think it was at a rate of 4¼ percent. Subsequent to that time the Treasury was able to borrow on long-term credit at lower interest rates, depending on the conditions of the market.

But the point I am afraid the Senator overlooks is that the Treasury must borrow all the time. It has to borrow almost from week to week; certainly from year to year. The Treasury Department's hands should not be tied to place it at a disadvantage with all other borrowers. It has to borrow to take care of the business of the country.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Might not it be wise for Congress, as a kind of board of directors, to tell the Secretary of the Treasury, at times when the interest rate is high, not to make a long-term commitment to borrow money on a short-term basis? Might not that be justifiable, in view of the fact that, as I understand, no long-term bonds will be coming due until November of next year. Consequently, it would be possible to maintain the maturities we now have until then; and before next July, or so, have the Congress consider whether it should permit borrowing for a higher interest rate, for a longer period.

In other words, Congress might act as a board of directors, in telling the Secretary of the Treasury, "Do not commit the Government to pay more than 4¼ percent over a longer period of time."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, my enthusiasm for putting Congress in the position of a board of directors or advisers to the Treasury Department and to the Federal Reserve Board in such matters is at a very low ebb.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am sure it is.

Mr. BUSH. In fact, it is at so low an ebb that I can hardly feel any enthusiasm at all for it.

I have pointed out that I am very much troubled by the fact that, in my judgment, the Congress—and I am not directing this remark at any individual Member of Congress; instead, I am directing it at both Houses of Congress—does not grasp the seriousness of the situation or see the error of its ways.

I feel that if the Congress were to attempt to tie the hands of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board, by telling them that they should do thus and so in this very critical period, that would be a very dangerous procedure; and I shall not subscribe to any part of it. In fact, I shall oppose it just as strongly as I possibly can.

So I cannot conceive of the necessity to have any board of directors, constituted by Members of Congress or anyone else, act insofar as the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board are concerned. They know what the problem is; it is before them every day. In effect, they are the trusted executives of the people, to deal with these matters.

I do not think anyone has questioned the ability of those men or their experience or their qualifications to serve in these positions.

The other day, I stated here on the floor that all the present members of the Federal Reserve Board were appointed by President Truman, in the first place, except one; one of the present members was appointed de novo by President Eisenhower. But all the others were appointed first by President Truman, and subsequently were reappointed by President Eisenhower; and of course that applies to the Chairman of the Board, who formerly was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, under the preceding administration; and he also was president of the Export-Import Bank, also under the preceding administration.

So no question has been raised insofar as I know, about the quality or the ability of those men or their capacity or their background or their competence to deal with these matters and these situations.

I think we are very fortunate—and this is one of the things about which I complimented the previous administration—to have had chosen for these important positions men of such high quality; and in that connection I refer to the Export-Import Bank, the Treasury, and, in particular, the Federal Reserve System.

So I do not see any need to establish any such board of directors, other than those who now serve in the persons of the present officials of those agencies.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield further to me?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Section 8 of article I of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to coin money and determine the value thereof; and I understand that Congress created the Federal Reserve Board to act as its agent. As a result, the Federal Reserve Board should be independent of the Treasury.

I know the Senator from Connecticut subscribes to the independence of the Federal Reserve Board. I would concede that he is correct when he says those on the Federal Reserve Board are men of high quality. They are, indeed, fine men of great experience.

However, is it not possible that those men, who have excellent backgrounds in banking, have a strong tendency—simply because they constantly deal with bankers and the problems of bankers, and because of the banking background of at least some of those officials—to see these problems primarily through the eyes of bankers? Is it not also possible that, from a banker's standpoint, high interest rates are as desirable as high prices for agricultural commodities are desirable to farmers?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has asked me several questions.

First, I think the Federal Reserve Board has just as much trouble from time to time holding off special pleaders of the banking fraternity as it does with persons from other sources; and the Board has plenty of trouble with special pleaders, as I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin realizes.

But I do not think there is in the country any better group with a better economic organization than the staff of the Federal Reserve Board. The research work done in that organization is of the highest order, and is relied upon by economists and organizations of all kinds in the commercial world, and also by organizations in the field of education and elsewhere.

In the Banking and Currency Committee, of which the Senator from Wisconsin and I are members, I have repeatedly heard the staff of the Federal Reserve Board lauded—not by me or by other Senators on my side of the aisle, but by Senators on the other side of the aisle.

I must say that I have no concern whatever that the bankers are going to affect the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board in a manner that will be deleterious to the interests of the people of the country.

I think the members of the Federal Reserve Board are very well able to take care of themselves; and they are surrounded by a group of economists and wise and experienced staff members who give them the best possible information on which to base their judgments and their forecasts of the future—and, of course, the latter are also quite important.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would agree with the Senator from Connecticut as regards the quality of the staff. They are fine men and they are expert in their field, and they have repeatedly demonstrated that.

However, it seems to me that it would be just as irresponsible for Congress to permit the Federal Reserve Board to adopt any monetary policy it might wish to adopt, as it would be for the President of the United States to permit the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Commerce to have carte blanche and a blank check, and to do whatever he might wish to do.

Certainly, Congress has the constitutional right, and also a right based on precedent, to establish certain specific policies; and one of them is to say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "We believe in a certain statutory limit on the interest rate on long-term bonds."

As the Senator from Connecticut has stated again and again, that policy is an old one; it goes back 40 years, and during that time it has been honored.

I can understand why perhaps it might be wise—although I do not think it would be—to increase the 4¼ percent limit. But I cannot see the justification for eliminating it entirely and putting Congress in the position of no longer exercising to that extent its responsibility over monetary policies.

Mr. BUSH. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin—who, of course, makes it difficult for me to reply to his questions, because after he asks one or two questions, he then asks three or four more before I have had a chance to reply to his first ones—that I do not question the right of Congress to do those things; and I am quite familiar with the constitutional provision in regard to the power of Congress to coin money, and so forth.

My point is—and I have stated it repeatedly here—that if Congress wishes to change something the Federal Reserve Board is doing, Congress should do so by means of legislation, not by shouting at the Board from the grandstand. I object to that kind or that type of advice from Congress, because in these "sense of the Congress" resolutions, Congress simply ducks the issue, and does not put its instructions into legal form.

Recently, the Secretary of the Treasury testified before the Joint Economic Committee. He was asked questions by Representative REUSS, in connection with the "sense of the Congress" resolution the House had in connection with the same bill—as the Senator from Wisconsin will recall. The Secretary of the Treasury replied, "We would much prefer to have you come to us with legislation." I would. I think the Senator from Wisconsin would if he were Secretary of the Treasury. If the Senate wants to change its authority, I suggest that we put it in the law, but we should not issue resolutions expressing the sense of the Senate or the sense of the House or the sense of the Congress.

Mr. PROXMIRE. To that particular part of the answer, let me reply by saying this is precisely what we are doing here. We are trying, in the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, to say that there should be some limit. We are permitting them 100 percent more than they are asking, but we think there is some limit the Government should pay on interest.

Mr. BUSH. It is exactly the limitation I am objecting to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Now the Senator wants it both ways. He says we should not pass "sense" resolutions, that we should not advise them from the grandstand, but we also should not enact legislation to restrict them.

Mr. BUSH. No. I say we should enact legislation if we want to effect a change. That is the way to do it. I object to the law which exists, and which has existed since World War I or thereabouts, which puts a ceiling on long-term interest rates. That is what I object to, because conditions so change as to put the Treasury in an almost impossible position in trying to manage the public debt. That is what I object to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me ask the Senator, on this particular amendment, which I think is going to be the real crux of the controversy in the Senate——

Mr. BUSH. Which amendment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Anderson amendment, which would put a limit on interest paid on savings bonds. That is the only amendment to date, unless the Senator from Connecticut wishes to press his amendment.

Mr. BUSH. I do not intend to press my amendment to a vote.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have asked the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Utah, who is also a monetary expert, and now I ask the Senator from Connecticut, for whom I have great respect, Is there any real reason why the Senate should not adopt the kind of generous limitation which the Senator from New Mexico has proposed, in other words, a 4½-percent limitation, since the Treasury has told us it wants to go only to 3¾ percent, rather than remove the ceiling entirely, as the bill now provides?

Mr. BUSH. My answer to that question would be, Why put the savers of this country, who want to invest in the credit of the United States, at a competitive disadvantage with anybody? I should reverse that question and ask, Why put the United States, which is bidding for the savings of the people of our country, at a competitive disadvantage with anybody?

Mr. PROXMIRE. We are going right along with the Treasury——

Mr. BUSH. Let me finish.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Very well.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator may be right, that if a ceiling of 4¼ percent were put on the interest rate, the Treasury might not have to avail itself of that level. It was only a short while ago that the appraisal was pretty general that savings bonds could be sold at 3¾ percent interest. So if a ceiling of 4¼ percent were put into effect, it might very well not be necessary to increase the interest to that ceiling, but, on the other hand, it might. I say there is absolutely no use in providing for a ceiling, because it might have an effect in restricting the freedom of the Treasury in respect to savings bonds.

Mr. President, I am about to yield the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I know the Senator has been very, very patient. I should like to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut to the statement of the Federal Reserve Board chairman, Mr. Martin, for whom I know the Senator from Connecticut has great respect, made in 1957, when he was asked by Mr. MILLS whether or not there should be a limit and how the limit ought to be determined. The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board replied, as appears on page 33 of the House hearings——

Mr. BUSH. What was the question asked of him?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The question was whether discretionary authority to raise the interest rates on E-bonds to 4¼ percent should be provided. This was in 1957, when there was a different kind of problem, but the principle is the same. The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board replied in part as follows:

> I served in the Treasury for a couple of years and I happen to believe that it would be wise to give them as much discretion as you gentlemen in your good judgment see fit to give them without giving them just blanket authority.

Now, blanket authority is exactly what the pending bill calls for, and what the Anderson amendment would prevent.

Mr. BUSH. I have not talked to the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board about this particular issue. Conditions have changed a good deal since he made that statement, which was 20 months ago now. I do not know how he would feel about it today.

I would say this to the Senator: I do not feel nearly so strongly about a ceiling on savings bonds being fixed at 4¼ percent as I do on the long-term marketable bonds of the country. I think the marketable securities ought not to have any interest ceilings. So far as savings bonds are concerned, I would say at the moment it would not appear as though a 4¼-percent interest ceiling would interfere with the sale of savings bonds, but I ask, Why put on a ceiling when sometime in the future it might interfere with the sale of those bonds?

Mr. President, I would like to yield the floor, if I may.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment, which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, line 4, to strike out the period and the quotation mark and add: "Provided, however, That in no event may the interest rate or the investment yield exceed 4¼ per centum per annum."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the proposal to put a ceiling of 4¼ percent on these bonds was one I thought never would have to come before this body for approval. All through the United States people were told that the new program called for 3¾ percent interest on savings bonds.

The hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, on page 9, quote the Secretary of the Treasury as saying:

> As I pointed out in that statement, the new savings bond program has three major features:
> (1) All series E and H bonds sold beginning June 1, 1959, will earn interest of 3¾ percent per annum if held to maturity—one-half percent more than at present—with lesser improved yields for shorter periods of holding.
> (2) All series E and H bonds outstanding will also earn approximately one-half percent per annum more than they do now.

I will skip some of the words, and read the last portion:

> (3) All series E bonds on which an extension has already been promised and which had not yet reached first maturity before June 1, 1959, will be offered an improved extension on which 3¾ percent will be paid if held the full additional 10 years, with lesser yields (starting at 3½ percent) for shorter periods of holding.

There is not anybody in the United States who would misunderstand that statement. That is a clear statement that the bonds will bear 3¾ percent interest. That is a clear statement of the planned program of the Department.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills of the Senate:

S. 36. An act for the relief of Page A. Wilson;

S. 252. An act to authorize Col. Philip M. Whitney, U.S. Army, retired, to accept and wear the decoration tendered him by the Government of the Republic of France;

S. 1081. An act for the relief of Arshalouis Simeonian;

S. 1149. An act for the relief of Capt. Thomas J. McArdle;

S. 1613. An act for the relief of Matilda Kolich;

S. 1891. An act for the relief of Donald G. Coplan;

S. 2101. An act for the relief of Ourania Ben Blikas;

S. 2291. An act to authorize the erection of a plaque in honor of the late Honorable Sam D. McReynolds on or near the site of the Chickamauga Dam; and

S. 2500. An act to authorize the appointment of Elwood R. Quesada to the retired list of the Regular Air Force, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 9105) making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the Tennessee Valley Authority, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will my friend from New Mexico yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the House has passed the public works appropriation bill (H.R. 9105) making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the Tennessee Valley Authority, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes. The bill has been received at the desk. I ask unanimous consent that it be read a second time, that prints of it be made, and that it lie at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I think I understand the request of the majority leader. The majority leader is requesting that the public works bill be printed and lie at the desk. This does not mean we are taking any action on the bill itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No action in approval or disapproval.

Mr. MORSE. No action in approval or disapproval; that is for future discussion and debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, when somebody tries to say that the same ceiling should be applied to the E- and H-bonds, with a 10-year maturity, which applies to all of the other bonds which run more than 5 years, people cry out that this is some sort of a horrible limitation upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States.

Mr. President, there is a little peculiarity in this presentation. The hearings before the House of Representatives, on page 13 at the bottom of the page, give some figures on the cost of this program. I asked at the completion of the very short hearings the Senate Finance Committee had what the cost would be, and I got no figures. We have no figures now as to what the cost would be. However, I find some figures in the House transcript of hearings. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury is shown at the bottom of page 13.

> The new savings bond program is expected to add $30 to $35 million to the saving bond part of the budget cost of interest on the public debt for the fiscal year 1960.

It is said that the new savings bond program is expected to add $30 million to $35 million to the savings bond part of the budget cost of interest on the public debt for the fiscal year 1960. People would naturally assume that that is all it would cost, some $35 million.

There is no great problem about this matter. At page 9 of the House hearings it is shown that we have at the present time some $42½ billion worth of E- and H-bonds outstanding. Anybody who has been past the fifth grade in school arithmetic knows that one-half of a percent on $42½ billion is approximately $213 million a year. Anyone who thinks the cost will be $35 million a year is simply misleading himself.

That is what it would cost, Mr. President, if we only increased the interest rate to 3¾ percent, but the people who are resisting the amendment I have proposed must feel that the interest rate is going above 4¼ percent. If the interest rate goes as high as 4¼ percent, the cost would be $425 million a year. That is a substantial amount to be added to the burden of this country.

It is true that bonds are not cashed at a rapid enough rate so as to take out of the Treasury in the first year more than $30 million or $35 million, but everybody knows that interest accumulates. When the interest accumulates it will accumulate at the rate of $425 million a year, if the interest rate is raised to 4¼ percent. That is a long way beyond $35 million a year.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that what the Senator's amendment would do would be to say to the Treasury Department, "If you are going to increase the cost of servicing these savings bonds by more than $425 million a year, come back to the Congress to get an authorization to do it."

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. Exactly. It would also say to the Treasury Department, "If you are in a terrible hurry about the matter, you could come back by next January."

Surely the cost of servicing these savings bonds not yet sold, or with regard to which credit is not yet given, is not going above an annual rate of $425 million before next January.

The program calls for 3¾ percent interest, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury not once but at least a dozen times. When we read the stories in every newspaper in the United States, it is indicated that the program is contemplated to add a half of 1 percent to the interest on the savings bonds of this country.

I say that a 4¼-percent ceiling is not going to be crippling, unless the Treasury Department plans to increase the cost of the program more than $425 million a year, as the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator recalls that in 1957 the Treasury Department asked us to increase the interest rates on E- and H-bonds, and at that time the Department was willing, finally, to accept an increase of the interest rate to 3.26 percent. The Department thought it could handle the program if Congress would fix the maximum amount, which was then recommended at 3.26 percent.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Department has given us no good reason why we should give an "open door," or an open end right to raise interest rates on E- and H-bonds.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct. Always before, so far as I can remember, the Treasury Department has come to the Congress and has said, "We want a certain ceiling under which we can work. We hope you will put it high enough so that we can operate under it, and we will operate under it."

This is the first time, so far as I know, in the history of the country, when it has been asked that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury be given unlimited authority to raise the interest rates on bonds to any figure they may desire. No other President of the United States has had any such power. What is so tragic about the situation now is that we are asked to provide a completely unparalleled grant of authority.

A lot of people have talked about the Congress abdicating its responsibilities. This is a question of Congress abdicating its responsibilities in a field where the Treasury Department says, "We want authority to add to the burdens of the United States more than $425 million a year on one small class of security alone, which represents only one-sixth, or approximately one-seventh, of the national debt of the United States."

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator will recall that in the testimony of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget before the Committee on Finance, not on this issue but on the related issue with which the committee was dealing last week, the Director indicated the Bureau had underestimated the cost of interest payments for the next fiscal year by some $500 million.

Mr. ANDERSON. Five hundred million dollars; that is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. If this request is granted, it would be necessary for a new estimate to be made of the increase.

Mr. ANDERSON. It would be $400 million more, or $200 million more, or whatever it may be.

Mr. McCARTHY. Whatever it may be.

Mr. ANDERSON. It would depend upon the interest rate put upon the bonds, yes.

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget came to Congress to explain why the budget is out of balance. The budget is now out of balance an extra $500 million because interest costs on the national debt went up that much.

As the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has pointed out to us, it is not simply the interest on the Federal debt which counts, but there is also interest on all the debts of all kinds in the country, which interest rates are raised because of the high rates of interest on Government bonds.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana, since I have mentioned his name.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from New Mexico knows that the public debt and the private debt total about $880 billion.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This administration has been cooperating with those groups which want to raise the interest rates on everything. I regret to say the present proposal is only one step along that line.

The Senator knows as well as I do that the great difficulty in which we are involved is not simply one of trying to hold these interest rates in line, but involves many other aspects. We cannot achieve a reasonable goal unless the President and the Federal Reserve Board, as well as the Secretary of the Treasury, want to use their powers along the line of fiscal policy. Congress simply cannot deal with all of the difficult matters which are involved. There are questions regarding the supply of currency, the availability of currency, and the supply of credit in this country. There are simply too many details, which are too intricate, for Congress to deal with all of the technical problems. That is why we turn the matter over to the Federal Reserve Board.

So long as the present policy is being pursued, unless Congress does something to call a halt to it, there will be no limit to how much this will cost the public of this Nation. I personally regard the increases in the interest rates as a hidden tax on the masses of the people of this country.

The general rate has been raised by about 2 percent, I would say, speaking conservatively about that. At least it is being raised, let us say, 2 percent interest on $880 billion of public and private debt on top of interest rates that were prevailing when this administration took power. That works out to about $18 billion in hidden tax, and when we analyze it down and see who gets it, we can say that probably 80 percent of that represents a tax on the working classes, on the farmers and the working people of this country, for the benefit of those who have money loaned out at interest.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In many instances the people who are making the most money—and in most instances it works out that way—are those who are not lending their own money, but those who are lending someone else's money. Private insurance companies, those who own bank stock, those who in effect are working for somebody else's, are really making a tremendous profit; and those who are paying are the rank-and-file people, the farmers and the working people. They will ultimately pay this $17 billion or $18 billion in hidden tax.

That is how it looks to some of us. I believe the Senator believes somewhat along that line because he has offered his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I surely do, and I have said time after time that we cannot suddenly raise the Government interest rates without the rates of all the banks and financial institutions going up. We pay an extremely heavy cost for it in the long run.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KERR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I should like to preface it with a statement that I am in thorough accord with anything to keep the interest rates down, although I am not in accord with the Senator's amendment.

I wish to correct the RECORD with respect to what the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has stated. He is one of the ablest men on the committee, and in the Senate. He referred to the total public and private debt as being $880 billion. I believe it is something under $775 billion total. I knew he would want the RECORD to reflect the accurate figure.

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe the total State, county, and municipal debt—I will not attempt to repeat it from memory; it was mentioned time after time in our hearings—was somewhere in the neighborhood of $880 million.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If I am wrong about it, I shall have to take it up with my assistants.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to commend my good friend from New Mexico for bringing up his amendment. I assure him that I will support it even though, if we had an administration which was really dedicated to keeping interest rates at a proper level, I am not sure that I would want to impose an interest ceiling on either long-term or short-term bonds or on savings bonds.

I wonder if the Senator does not agree with me that if we are going to continue to work to bring interest rates down, in view of the economic views of the present administration, it is going to be absolutely necessary to keep interest ceilings.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I do. I would say to the Senator that I have no absolute assurance that the way to handle the national debt is to keep a ceiling on it of 4¼ percent. What I have been hopeful is that the Committee on Finance would have a very carefully planned and carefully conducted study made of this question early in the next congressional year, starting perhaps in January. We have had no real study made of this whole question. I attended, as did other members of the Finance Committee, the presentation that was made to us. There was no presentation that I heard which justified the taking off of a limit on these bonds. There was, on the contrary, a belief on the part of many of us that the 4¼-percent ceiling ought to be imposed. That matter was submitted to the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee voted against it by not too large a vote, but nonetheless it voted against it. I believe that was a serious mistake, because we say to the country that we believe in keeping a ceiling on a 7-year bond, on an 8-year bond, on a 9-year bond, and on a 20-year bond, but will not take it off on E- and H-bonds.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has had printed an amendment with which I am in complete accord, and it reads—it is short:

> It is the sense of the Congress that the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board should use their powers to bring about a general reduction in the level of interest rate on public and private lending.

I wish that we could have an opportunity, in a Senate in which no advance commitments had been made, to debate that amendment. I would hope that that amendment would be carried by a substantial majority vote.

I realize the parliamentary situation is such that we cannot do that. Certain "gentlemen's agreements" have been made with respect to the proposed legislation. I am not a party to those agreements, but I, for one, will not try to set them aside. However, I wish the RECORD to show unequivocally that I would support the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana if I had a chance to do so. I hope that early in the next session we will have an opportunity to bring up the subject, and I hope at that time the entire Democratic Party—North, South, East, and West—will unite in an effort to drive these interest rates down and to persuade the Eisenhower administration that it has been done, it can be done again, and it must be done if our economy is to move forward the way it should.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. With reference to the statement of the distinguished and able Senator from Pennsylvania, the junior Senator from Louisiana had no knowledge of any commitments being made on anyone's part. However, I had in mind offering my amendment, and did offer it in the committee. I was informed that there were certain members on the committee who felt that there had been gentleman's agreements arrived at that we would not bring up this tight-money, high-interest-rate question.

The junior Senator from Louisiana had not been a party to such an understanding, but it did cost him a couple of votes—maybe more than two votes—in the committee when he offered his amendment, and for that reason he felt that if there had been some commitment he would not call his amendment up for the reason that he would like a chance to carry it on its merits, and he would hope that there would not be some commitments to vote against it, so that persons who might vote against it would at heart be in favor of it.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I say to the Senator from Louisiana that many of us felt very deeply that his amendment was a good amendment which might at an appropriate time be adopted. That is why I have said that early in the next session a study ought to be made. I should like to tell the Senate why I believe a study ought to be made early in the next session and why at that time his amendment would be extremely useful.

Until the Federal Reserve Board takes a substantial part in trying to handle the situation we are never going to be able to do anything. The only thing that the ceiling does at the present time is to say to the Federal Reserve Board that it had better be careful as to how high it hikes the interest rate having in mind the problems of the Treasury, if the Federal Reserve Board plays fast and loose, the Treasury will have an interest rate which will make its burden extremely hard to carry.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from New Mexico and I generally share the same views on this matter. We are very much concerned about the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury apparently using first one device and then another to keep driving up the interest rates when we feel they should be using every effort to bring them down.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Some of us gain the impression that those who control the availability of credit in this country—and currency and credit for the purposes of which I am speaking are the same thing—are controlling both sides of the table, both the borrowing side and the lending side, and by virtue of that influence on the borrowing side of the table, they seem to be pushing up these interest rates far beyond what we think they ought to be. And it is my feeling and I believe it is the feeling of the Senator from New Mexico that much of our difficulty lies in the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board should be using its power to hold those interest rates down, but we feel that the President is using his power to urge the Federal Reserve Board to let the rates go up, and the Federal Reserve Board in turn is using Wall Street to let these interest rates go up.

The statement has been made that this is what the market would do to try to put it in layman's terms, it seems to me that it is a matter of the administration's saying, "We did not raise these interest rates. We turned it over to Wall Street and let them raise them."

I believe that is the way it is working.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator may have discussed this point, but in the hearings the Treasury Department argued that if we should establish a ceiling it would tend to become a floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator is familiar with the record. I am sure he concurs in my opinion that this is the most ridiculous argument that has been made in support of this proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON. The witness from the Treasury made the flat statement in the committee that we should not establish a ceiling of 4¼ percent because it had been his experience that a ceiling tended to become a floor.

I have before me the last publication of Aubrey G. Lanston & Co., Inc., a service which I read regularly, because of its very effective reporting on Government bonds. This issue is dated September 8, 1959, which is about as recent as it is possible to get. The issue came out today. I would be happy to have the Treasury go through the list and find out if, while the 4¼-percent ceiling was in effect, it tended to become a floor. It certainly will not find any in the first category of maturities, ending December 31, 1959. The highest interest rate was 3⅜, but that was a bond that was not even under the ceiling.

In the 1960 category the highest rate is 3.34; but again, that is a bond that did not come under the ceiling. There are some 4 percent bonds; there is nothing at 4¼; nothing at 4¼ in 1961; nothing at 4¼ in 1962; and on we go. I challenged the representative of the Treasury to cite one long-term bond issue with respect to which the ceiling had become a floor. He could not do so.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator point out when the rate of 4¼ was first established as a ceiling?

Mr. ANDERSON. Nineteen hundred and eighteen.

Mr. McCARTHY. During World War I.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. So far as E- and H-bonds are concerned, the 3-percent rate was established in 1935.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. We did not reach the ceiling in that category until 1952.

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe that is correct. It was 2.90 for a long time.

We have exceeded the 4¼-percent limit in connection with certain bond issues, but they were 1-year and 4-year bonds issued a short time ago, in what I thought was the most unfortunate market in which we could have issued them, and at the most unfortunate time.

Mr. McCARTHY. They were issues on which there was no ceiling.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator, with whom I agree completely, if it would not be a gross irresponsibility on the part of the Congress to remove any ceiling whatsoever on the long-term interest rate that can be paid by this administration, or by any succeeding administration.

Incidentally, the only newspaper I have been able to find that has correctly reported the bill from the House, which we have under consideration, is the Wall Street Journal, which frankly admits that the bill would give the President the right to pay whatever rate he finds is necessary to finance the sale of savings bonds.

My question is this: If the Treasury representatives—and I presume they testified formally before the distinguished Finance Committee—said that they wanted to issue savings bonds which would carry 3¾ percent interest, why did the committee bring out a bill with an unlimited ceiling? Why did it not establish some ceiling, at least as generous as that which the distinguished Senator from New Mexico proposes, to make it concurrent with the other long-term public debt ceiling of 4¼ percent?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is a curious thing, but if the Senator will go through the hearings he will not find much attention paid to the question of 3¾ percent. It is mentioned in the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is assumed that that is what the program is. The House took the bill as presented, apparently noticing that there was no ceiling, but believing that the commitment of the Secretary of the Treasury bound him not to go beyond 3¾ percent. But when we presented the Secretary with a ceiling of 4¼ percent, one-half of 1 percent higher, he declined to accept it. So obviously they had no intention of observing a 3¾ percent ceiling. They did not want to be bound by it. They did not want to be bound by a 4¼-percent ceiling.

If we go up to 4¼ percent, as the Senator from Wisconsin pointed out, that is $425 million a year. We might not pay that out the first year, because not everyone would be cashing bonds, but $425 million a year would be the cost. It does not matter whether we have to wait a few years to pay it or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is an additional reason why we should not grant the open-end authority which is asked for. The bill which the committee is recommending includes a non-recognition-of-gain provision, which if the holder of the bonds is willing to take advantage of it, should have the effect of depressing the interest which would have to be offered in order to get people to buy the bonds.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not opposed to the carry-forward provision in the bill. I think it is a little sweetening, but justifiable sweetening. We want to tempt people to hold onto the savings bonds. We have $42 billion in them, and they are a very stable force in the whole bond market. By allowing a person to transfer the interest earnings without paying a tax, and postponing the tax, we make an attractive bond out of it.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr MONRONEY. Since there seems to be no logical explanation in the RECORD as to why the Secretary of the Treasury, appearing before the committee with a proposal to issue savings bonds at 3¾ percent, would be unhappy with the distinguished Senator's proposal to give him an extra one-half of 1 percent, which he asked for, I suggest that perhaps the real reason is the strange similarity to section 101 in the bill before us, which would allow the President to suspend any ceiling, to whatever extent he wished, when he found it to be in the national interest.

Does it not appear to the distinguished Senator that, in addition to the flexibility of increased interest rates up and down the line, if we give the department this language, which it carefully brought to us under the guise of a poor man's interest rate increases for his return, having done that in the month of September, in January the Treasury will come back with the same language and say, "This is identical with what you did for savings bonds. You suspended the 4¼ percent ceiling. You suspended the 3.26 ceiling. You have broken the long-time precedent of Congress holding control of the interest rates on our bond issues."

Therefore, they will say that they need uniformity. They will say, "Just pass this tiny package, and we will put it all in the President's hands. He knows best. 'Papa fixes.' He can tell what interest rates we should pay."

Is not that a part of the reason why the Treasury today is fighting so hard for language which will be useful to it after January, when it resumes its grand push forward to reach the outer spaces of this earth's atmosphere in interest rates paid by the Federal Government on Government securities?

Mr. ANDERSON. After studying the subject for some time, that is the only conclusion I can reach. Certainly, they do not need 4¼ percent on savings bonds at this time, nor will they need 4¼ percent on savings bonds by next January. Therefore, they want to get language in this bill which can be a precedent for language in the future.

I have a little different theory. I believe that the Congress should take a great deal of time to study the problem. It should study it with great care and deliberation.

Recently, there has been released a report known as the Radcliffe report. The Radcliffe committee was appointed to study and report on the workings of the monetary system of Great Britain. In the Lanston report for August 31, there was this comment, which I should like to place in the RECORD:

> A most interesting document has just become available—the Radcliffe report. Two years and three months ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the British Government appointed a committee to study and report on the workings of the monetary system of Great Britain with the Right Honorable Lord Radcliffe, G.B.E. as chairman. The 339-page text (plus additional tabulations, etc.) is a noteworthy achievement as a text book on the British financial mechanism.

I do not say the conclusions of the Radcliffe report are completely provisions that ought to be adopted in the United States. From the little I have learned about it, the Radcliffe report supports some of the theories men who believe, as the Senator from Louisiana has indicated, the Federal Reserve Board out to work with the Treasury in trying to keep interest rates at some reasonable level. All I am trying to suggest is that when we pass upon the situation we ought to have in front of us information such as this. We ought to have the testimony of Treasury experts. We ought to take into consideration the two volumes of proceedings and testimony, in excess of 1,000 pages, the Senate Finance Committee achieved in its study of the financial condition of the United States. We should make a serious effort to find what the program of the country ought to be.

Instead of that we are being asked, without any testimony from the Treasury Department, to give the President unlimited authority and complete freedom in the setting of interest rates at any figure he desires, whether it be 10 or 20 percent. I know he is not going to set them at that figure, but this measure would give the President complete freedom. That is a wholly new concept, and I believe the Senate ought to take a close look at the measure before it abdicates the congressional right to fix interest rates.

The House not having learned about what the proposed legislation may lead to, or perhaps understanding it but not being worried about it, did pass the bill. If the Senate now passes it, we shall have put in the hands of the President complete authority to do as he wishes with the E- and H-bonds as far as interest is concerned, and I believe it is frightfully dangerous.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I do not believe the Members of the House of Representatives understood. Certainly the able members of the press who covered the action in the House and the able members of the press in the Senate gallery who covered the report did not recognize that the proposed legislation embodied an unlimited ceiling and took the word of the Treasury in its testimony that we were merely considering an increase in the interest rates to 3¾ percent.

I have examined almost a dozen papers in the Marble Room today trying to find a definitive story stating what the issue was. I stated what I found in the Wall Street Journal. The financial writers in the Sunday issue of the New York Times, who are men of great reputation, interpreted the bill as being a means of raising the interest rate from 3¼ to 3¾. Other financial writers in Philadelphia and writers on the New York Herald Tribune have done the same thing. Consequently I believe even Senators who had read the papers believed this bill, until they read it section by section, would merely raise the ceiling from 3.26 to 3.34.

More than a casual 2-hour hearing before the Finance Committee behind closed doors should be afforded the proposed legislation before we break a precedent which has stood throughout the entire history of the United States. No President since George Washington has ever had the authority we are being asked to give the President, and we are asked to give it after only a brief 2-hour hearing and with the closing days of Congress facing us.

Mr. ANDERSON. I can only say to the Senator far less than 2 hours were spent on this subject. The subject of interest rates occupied about 15 minutes.

A housing bill has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. We may take it up when we have concluded action on the bill now under consideration.

The public works appropriation bill has been passed by the House. It is at the desk. We may either call it up on motion or refer it to committee. A determination has not been made yet on that matter. The distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil Functions Appropriations, is waiting for me on the telephone now. We will try to make a decision on that question in the next few hours.

The committee will meet in a session at 7:30 this evening on the mutual security appropriation bill, in order to continue voting on amendments. I do not anticipate that it will be reported earlier than midnight. Under the rule, it would have to lie over for 3 days. So the earliest time when it could be considered would be 12:01 on Saturday morning. It is unlikely that the Senate will convene that early, but I am certain that we expect to spend Saturday and perhaps a part of Monday on the mutual security appropriation bill, if necessary.

ORDER FOR CALL OF CALENDAR ON WEDNESDAY

I should like to ask unanimous consent for a calendar call. I should like to have the calendar called at an early hour tomorrow. I have asked the members of the calendar committee, on both sides of the aisle, to be available. Some 50 bills have been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary today. They will not be available tomorrow, so it probably will be necessary to have another calendar call later in the week.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order, after the conclusion of morning business tomorrow, to have a call of the calendar of bills to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS TOMORROW WITH A LIMITATION OF 3 MINUTES ON STATEMENTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be the usual morning hour tomorrow for the introduction of bills, petitions, and memorials and for the transaction of routine business, with a limitation of 3 minutes on statements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 9:30 tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Will the majority leader please identify the number of the bill with which the call of the calendar will start?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Calendar No. 812.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I may say to the majority leader that, together with many other Members, and like the shipwrecked sailor who was clinging desperately to a spar, I have been fondly clinging to the hope that before the week was out, we could terminate the session; and of course I have hoped that the 3-day rule in regard to appropriation bills would be waived.

If the report is filed tonight, and if there is no insistence on observing the rule, actually the bill could be taken up, not on Saturday, but on Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not have the floor, although I am willing to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Oregon; and I also wish to comment on this point.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to comment on it, too.

I always like to assume responsibility for the things for which I am responsible, and I never like to have anyone else take responsibility for me.

I wish to assure the Senator from Illinois that the rule will not be waived, if it is within my power to prevent the waiving of the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a number of measures are in conference. I do not anticipate that we shall take any great length of time in dealing with the housing bill. I think we shall spend some time on the public works bill.

I know there are a number of general bills which we have agreed to bring up, such as the credit union bill and others, which will be brought up by way of motion.

I know that some of the others have been cleared by the policy committee.

Serious objection has been made to a number of bills which have been cleared by the policy committee.

I doubt that the Senate will take up all the bills I listed; but they have been cleared by the policy committee, because we were not sure whether we would have another meeting, and we wanted to announce to the Senate that those bills had been cleared for Senate consideration.

I do know that the Senate will consider the housing bill and the public works bill at an early date, shortly after the Senate completes its action on the pending bill; and we shall have a call of the calendar, and perhaps several of them; and at an early date we shall take action on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield further to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wonder whether the majority leader will care to speculate as to when the final curtain on this session might be brought down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I never have target hours or target dates. I believe we should remain here until we have done our job.

I have seen in the newspapers statements to the effect that the Congress is going to adjourn sine die on August 15, or on Labor Day, or on September 12; and some of them have predicted that we might even take a recess, and return a little later—or some have suggested that.

I think we should stay here until we finish our job.

For the information of any Senators who may interested, I state that I think it very unlikely that we can complete action on all the bills that have been listed and on the mutual security appropriation bill, and adjourn sine die Saturday night. I think we shall be here the early part of the following week, at the least, and that the end of the session will not come before then, at the earliest.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it correct to say that again and again and again we have hoped for adjournment, but it did not quite eventuate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I notice that the majority leader said he would not expect another meeting of the policy committee, or, in effect, that he was not contemplating that there would be another meeting of the policy committee. But that does not mean that the policy committee might not meet if there were——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not at all; if the Senate feels that any other bills which were reported should be considered, we frequently poll the committee or we frequently have meetings in the mornings or in the afternoons. As a matter of fact, when we met today, we took action on every bill on the calendar.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to say, most respectfully, and with complete humbleness, that I hold to the point of view that is shared by a few of my colleagues—although just how many, I do not know, or how much their number may increase in the days immediately ahead, I do not know—that we should take some action on aid to education or school legislation before we adjourn; and if I correctly understood the references which have been made to the calendar, that measure was not included in the group of bills listed by the majority leader.

This morning, the committee voted to have the McNamara bill reported and placed on the calendar.

I believe that bill is of such great importance to the Nation that the Congress should take some action on it.

Also, this morning, in the Labor Committee, we had a brief discussion about reporting a bill calling for amendments to the minimum wage law, in keeping with the main provisions of the Kennedy-Morse bill; and I have reason to believe that the Labor Committee in all probability will hold a meeting on that measure and will vote it either up or down in the next couple of days. We already have it out of the subcommittee.

My third point is that I believe we should make a valiant attempt, in the Senate, next week, to pass some proposed legislation in the rather controversial field of civil rights; I refer to measures dealing with the main provisions of the old title III of the 1957 bill, which was dropped from that bill.

Some of us are very much interested in those three subject matters.

All I can do is petition the policy committee and place myself at its mercy, from the standpoint of exercising its discretion—knowing that some of us have these very definite views in regard to action which we believe should be taken on these three matters, as a minimum, for a program, in addition to the items suggested by the majority leader.

But as I said on yesterday, in listing the measures on which I thought the Senate should take action, that was only a small part of the package I suggested.

Of course I shall do my best to encompass the maximum amount of proposed legislation that I think the Senate should pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In connection with the education bill, it is my information that it has been ordered reported, but has not yet been reported, and that perhaps it will take some time for the report—including the supplemental views and the minority views—to be prepared.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on that point will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It is my understanding—and I hope the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Michigan will correct me if I am in error—that the committee agreed today that the individual and minority views would be filed not later than Friday night.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is consistent with my information.

Furthermore, no civil rights bill is on the calendar. I cannot anticipate what action will be taken on minimum wages. But we can always consider any bills which are on the calendar.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. If it is the desire of the majority leader that we do so, we can expedite the reporting of the education bill. But we shall have to wait until Friday to have the reports, as he understands.

But if it is his desire that we do so, we can have the bill before the Senate tomorrow, with the understanding that we would have to wait until Friday for the reports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is a matter for the chairman of the committee to determine. I have no desire to interfere one way or another with the functioning of the committee.

Mr. McNAMARA. However, if that is what the Senator from Texas desires, we shall be glad to cooperate in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not insist; that matter is up to the committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, can the Senator from Texas advise me whether he thinks we can adjourn or should adjourn without extending the life of the Commission on Civil Rights?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think we shall get a chance to act on that matter in connection with the mutual security bill. As most Senators know, there is a supplemental appropriation request for $500,000 to continue the Civil Rights Commission. A point of order has been made against an appropriation that does not carry authority for the Commission. That point of order does lie, and has been sustained; and the chairman of the committee has been directed by the committee to give notice of an intention to move to suspend the rule, and then to include authority for the continuance of the Civil Rights Commission for 2 years; and then, if the rule is suspended by a two-thirds vote, to offer to the mutual security appropriation bill the amendment calling for the $500,000, as requested by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Texas said "the committee." Does he mean the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. The mutual security appropriation bill will come from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CLARK. Not the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; I said the mutual security appropriation bill.

The Bureau of the Budget requested an appropriation of $500,000, in a supplemental estimate, and sent it to the Appropriations Committee; and the committee acted on it today, by raising the point of order that there was no authority for the Commission beyond November 8; and the committee then took action to direct the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to give notice of an intention to move to suspend the rule and, after proper notice is given, on Saturday that motion will be voted on; and if two-thirds vote in the affirmative, the rule will be suspended, and such proposed legislation will be attached to the appropriation bill, so as to authorize the Civil Rights Commission to exist for another 2 years.

Then, if the vote on that question is in the affirmative, the chairman of the committee will submit an amendment calling for an appropriation of $500,000 for the Commission for the next 2 years.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Just for the information of the Senate, I would like to inquire what the rest of the workload is for the evening.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, I would like to get the yeas and nays on the Anderson amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays on the Anderson amendment are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Next, I would hope we could get a vote on this amendment at a reasonable hour. We cannot get a unanimous-consent agreement, I am sure, but I have observed that we have spent most of the day on this bill. I hope we can get a vote on the amendment. I am not aware that there are too many other amendments to be offered. We would like to conclude action on the bill tonight so we can take up the housing bill and the public works bill tomorrow.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have tried to use some time speaking on the amendment, but there have been a good many interruptions. I will try to finish what I have to say in not more than 10 minutes. There are several other Senators, such as the junior Senator from Wisconsin and the junior Senator from Tennessee, who would like to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wonder if I could get an indication as to how many Senators wish to speak on this amendment.

[Several Senators indicated a desire to speak on the amendment.]

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would those who have indicated they wish to speak say they would like 10 or 15 minutes?

[Indications in the affirmative.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Senators should be on notice that we should be voting some time around 7:15 p.m.; perhaps a little earlier or a little later.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Am I to understand from the colloquy which has ensued between the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader that there is no possibility of adjourning sine die this week, but there is a possibility of adjourning sine die some time between next Monday and Thursday?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not going to set a target date or say what is possible or what is not possible. I am going to do as much as I can, as soon as I can, consistent with the desires of my colleagues. I am going to come in early and stay late. But anyone knows that when we have 120 bills, some of which require discussion, when we have such bills as the mutual security appropriation bill, the housing bill, and the civil functions bill, and when we have as many vetoes as we have had, we are going to have some discussion of this general situation. I do not see any possibility of adjourning this week, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I want to say I thought we would adjourn around the first of the month. The minority leader thought we would adjourn around Labor Day. The majority leader has never said when we would adjourn. Perhaps we are getting toward that particular objective at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am going to ask the Senate to stay here as long as it wants to stay and is willing to stay, to do the job that has to be done. That is as near as I will say about the date of adjournment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from New Mexico for yielding the time in order to have this colloquy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I appreciate the generosity of the Senator. We will have a call of the calendar following the morning hour tomorrow, and we will have a call of the Executive Calendar as well. I want all Members of the Senate to be on notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the majority and minority leaders that it was no sacrifice to yield to them, because all through the assembly of Senators, there was a desire to find out what the program was and what bills were going to be called up. I appreciate the information very much.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may propound a question to the majority leader?

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KERR. Is it possible to get a unanimous-consent agreement on the pending business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have explored that question for some time. I do not think it would be considered from a favorable viewpoint at this time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to my able colleague, the Senator from Oklahoma, that I know he will be brief when he discusses this matter. I will try to be brief in discussing it. In that way we will probably proceed just as rapidly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There are five or six Senators on this side who have indicated a desire to speak on the amendment. I think it will be about 7:30 before we have a vote.

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Has there ever been a time in our history when the President has been given unlimited power in this category of Government obligations?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have tried to have that question subjected to research, and others have. All come up with the same answer: Never has the President had such unlimited power. Perhaps our research was defective. It could have been, because it had to be hurriedly done. None of us knew this was going to be requested. So far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have made a conscientious check, and the Library of Congress has made a conscientious check, this power has never before been granted in the history of the Republic.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That seems to be the crucial point here, which I think has been overlooked.

I do not see how Congress can possibly justify, with very little argument, based on so little explanation, surrendering completely this power, when it has not been done before in history.

Of course, it happened in executive session, but I ask the Senator if it is not true that the question was asked of the Treasury whether there ever had been a time when the Congress surrendered to the Executive power to raise interest rates, without any ceiling at all. I believe the Treasury's answer was "No, there could not have been, because only recently has the Executive had any discretion whatsoever to raise interest rates." The Congress used to fix the interest rate. It would pass a bill and fix the interest rate on a particular class of Government obligation. So this will be the first time we have ever just turned the power over to the Executive, without any restraints whatever, to raise interest rates on Government obligations.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana I am sure that is correct. That was the answer made by the Treasury. Heretofore, we have had bond issues, and the Congress has wirtten in the terms. That was done within the proper constitutional power of the Congress. That power is provided in the Constitution. That is what we are supposed to do. Only recently have we gotten the theory that we can turn everything over to the Treasury.

One of the principal reasons why the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] has been ill for a while is that he has felt so strongly on this question. He has expressed himself so forcefully on this question of constantly turning over to the Executive powers which the Executive does not have under the Constitution. Recently there was a bill before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and which was about to be agreed on. We received the strongest representations from the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] because he does not believe Congress should turn over to the Executive powers which the Constitution placed in the hands of Congress—not reserved powers, but specifically put in the hands of Congress under the Constitution. This is an example of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think we might have an answer to the question raised by the Senator from Louisiana, and get it quite effectively, if we read one of the remarks Mr. Stans made before our committee when he was testifying on the gas tax bill. The administration seems to be opposed to any kind of fixed point of reference. The question was raised by the junior Senator from Tennessee, after he had cited problems raised as a result of imposing the gas tax.

He turned to Mr. Stans and he said, "What about the problems?" Mr. Stans said, "We do not deal in problems; we deal in dimensions."

It seems to me we are now applying the theory of relativity to the fiscal problems of the Federal Government. If possible, we should get help from someone who pretends to understand the Republican administration. We should get some good Republican who understands and defends the administration and the Treasury Department, some good Republican who defends the philosophy of Mr. Stans, who will tell us what is meant when Mr. Stans says that the administration deals not in problems, but in dimensions.

I think the Senator from New Mexico raised a good question earlier when he said that by simple arithmetic the cost could be established. Evidently the administration is not using simple arithmetic. If we could get some definition of the dimension in which the administration deals—the first dimension, second dimension, third dimension, whatever dimension it may be—or of the state of relativity being applied to the fiscal theories of this country, we might be able to understand the administration's position on the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I read the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, who said that it would cost $30 million to $35 million to the savings bond part of the budget cost of interest on the public debt for the fiscal year 1960.

A more simple answer would be, it seems to me, "We have $42½ billion worth of bonds, and if you raise the interest rate a half of 1 percent that would cost approximately $212 million per year."

If we raise the interest rate 1 percent, which my amendment would allow, it would be $425 million a year.

This is a statement which is cleverly written, I admit, which says that it would add $30 million to $35 million to the savings bond part of the budget cost of interest on the public debt for the fiscal year 1960. He is dealing in dimensions, not problems; I quite agree with the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to ask a question, but before I ask the question, if the Senator will permit, I should like to preface it with a brief comment.

Earlier this afternoon the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE]—and now the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]—joined with the Senator from New Mexico in putting their fingers on what I think is the fatal weakness of the bill before the Senate, if we carry out what I consider to be our legislative trust and responsibility in the Senate.

As the Senators have pointed out, what we are being asked to do is to delegate our power to the President of the United States. If we do not agree to the Anderson amendment we will be delegating legislative authority to fix interest rates at the President's discretion.

Mr. President, I use my words with great care. If we do that as a Senate of the United States we shall move this Government of ours in the direction of an executive government rather than a government under a check and balance system where the legislature exercises its constitutional prerogatives checked by a President who has the right to veto the legislative process of the Congress.

What we really will be doing is undercutting the whole procedure in the Constitution of the United States, which provides for checks upon the power of the President, by giving him what amounts to a legislative function. If we can do that in this instance we can do it with respect to many other matters.

I wish to say, most respectfully, as the Senator from New Mexico pointed out, that has been the trend in recent years. So the Senator from New Mexico, in my opinion, is very sound in raising a basic question of constitutional theory on the floor of the Senate.

What is there about this problem which justifies the Senate in abdicating its constitutional prerogative and duty? I do not know of any emergency which would justify our doing that with respect to this subject matter. I warn my colleagues in the Senate that they will rue the day if they permit the administration to get by with this undercutting of the fabric of our Constitution itself, because that is what we would be doing, Mr. President.

I think the Senator from New Mexico is very correct in bringing our attention to the position taken by the man who I think is the greatest constitutional lawyer in this body, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. The Senator from Wyoming has pleaded with us time and time again in recent years concerning the growing threat to the constitutional powers of the Congress of the United States. It is a very dangerous threat. Now is the time to come to grips with it.

I say most respectfully, I think we need to say to the President, "Mr. President, you are always free to exercise your veto power, but we are going to pass legislation which will carry out our constitutional right"—and I happen to think it is a duty—"to maintain the control over the fixing of interest rates." We should not "pass the buck," because of terrific business pressures which may be put on us at this time, to the President of the United States, and give him what amounts to arbitrary and unchecked power, so far as the interest-making decisions are concerned.

It is no answer to say to me, Mr. President, "Oh, we can come back at a later day and take away what we have given to the President."

Let us be realists. We know what happens in the operations of the Congress. We are always so busy with the new problems which confront us at every session of Congress that we like to forget about actions we have already taken. Those are actions of a past day, and we are concerned about the present.

I respectfully point out, and the RECORD will bear me out, there has to be the creation of some great public clamor, usually, to cause us to go back and repeal something we have already done.

We can imagine the people of this country coming to grips with and understanding this abstract problem of economics with which we are dealing. The administration knows how difficult it is, Mr. President, to get the public to understand the very technical implications of this problem. We have been elected, Mr. President, to carry out our trust, when we understand it. We do understand it. Every man in this body knows what he will be doing if he votes against the Anderson amendment. Every man knows he will be voting to give the President of the United States at least for the time being, and it is going to be for a long time, I respectfully say, an unchecked power over the fixing of interest rates in this country.

That is dangerous. It is dangerous from the standpoint of the welfare of the people of this country. I am going to be no party to it. I hope the Senate will consider the matter long enough tonight to really ponder what it is doing, to give us the votes we need in order to place a check which, under the Constitution, it is our duty to place on the President of the United States with respect to this problem.

I am also fearful of the effect upon other interest rates, if we give this unchecked power to the President. To permit rates for savings bonds to go above the ceiling proposed by the Senator from New Mexico would, I believe, increase the upward pressure upon rates in mutual savings accounts and savings and loan accounts, which compete with savings bonds.

Eventually, we would be faced with overwhelming pressure to raise rates for marketable bonds. The least we should do to keep the lid on interest payments is to approve the pending amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. There are two things in the current situation at which I believe Congress should take a look. It is true that very frequently these matters are not discussed in the meetings of the Finance Committee. Apparently they are not worrying many people. The situation occasionally does worry some of us who have been watching the Government bond market for a long time.

The newspapers of today, for example, record the fact that yesterday the Government paid 3.979 for its 13-week bills.

The Government of the United States goes into the money market every Monday and buys the money it needs for current purposes. It needed $1,200 million roughly when it went into the market yesterday. It got a bid of 3.979 and that, according to the newspaper I have in my hand, was a new 26-year high for the third consecutive issue of 13-week Treasury bills. The latest issue was sold at a price equivalent to an average yield of 3.979 percent. The previous similar issue drew a rate of 3.889 percent. The current rate is the highest since 4.229 percent, on a similar issue dated March 6, 1933, during the bank holiday period.

While it is not very nice to be reminded of a situation which existed during the bank holiday period, there is one interesting fact in connection with this rate. Here we have a situation where the Treasury 13-week bill rate has gone above the discount rate. That is a phenomenon in American finance. It is a very unusual situation. It has sometimes foreboded financial trouble. The people of this country would be well advised to pay a little attention to the fact that the Treasury 13-week bill rate is above the discount rate, which is now 3½ percent. I say this to warn the Senate, that this is no time to be fooling with a financial situation of this nature, trying to give unlimited power to the President which he has never had.

The Committee on Finance has released a publication entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States." In that publication there appears a paragraph which reads as follows, at page 2192:

> Fifth, the present difficulty of selling long-term bonds is the result in no small part of the stock market boom; but note that at the end of 1958 for the first time in a generation stocks were yielding less than bonds and values were up above those justified by profit prospects; and hesitation in the rise of the stock market could easily improve the bond situation.

The important words in that statement are that for the first time in a generation stocks are yielding less than bonds.

It so happens that when we had the Secretary of the Treasury testifying in an investigation of the financial condition of the United States, Secretary Humphrey was asked some questions about this sort of situation. We had a very brief period in which that situation occurred, in 1956. I reminded him of some of the financial difficulties we have had. I reminded him that in 1873 we had very high interest rates and we had a panic shortly thereafter, and that built up to a peak in 1893, and then we had some troubles thereafter. Railroad bonds went to 4.1 percent. Commercial rates went up to 7.67.

Then we had bad financial troubles in 1907. The interest rates on railroads got very high again, much higher than usual. The commercial rate got to 6.66.

We had financial troubles in 1920. We had difficulties and we got into a great deal of financial trouble.

Then in 1929 we had a parallel situation when interest rates got very high.

Why is it that people are not worried about it, after having been through five or six panics, when we had this sort of trouble, even though it was called a depression in 1929? Why do we go through it round after round and never see the warnings?

I say that this accumulation of interest rates is dangerous to this country. People should be looking at it carefully. We can go through all the tables we have and we cannot find any reason why this rate needs to go to 4¼ percent. The witnesses who testified said they only wanted 3¾. The plan only called for 3¾. We give them a half percent above that. We give them twice as much as they said they would use. Then they tell us the difficulty they would be under.

All we have to do is pick up the Government bond list week after week and take a look at what is going on. If we want to buy a 1-year bond that has a high yield, we can buy a 2⅛ of November 15, 1960, at 97–14 to yield 4.37 percent.

We can buy a 2-year bond, November 15, 1961, for 95–6, yielding 4.85 percent; or a 3-year bond, October 1, 1962, which will yield 4.69 percent.

On down the line every one of these issues is about 4 percent, and the Treasury tells us, as soon as we give them this unlimited authority, "We are up against a tough market. We cannot sell these savings bonds, because a person can buy them for 1 year, 2 years, 3 years, 4 years, 5 years, and even 10 years, and a 10-year bond is equal to a December 15, 1965, bond which is selling at 82–12 with a yield of 4.68 percent.

A man does not need to buy an E-bond or an H-bond when he can buy a bond for 1, 2, 3, 5, or 10 years, any place he wants to go, and get from 4.50 to 4.92.

Treasury 2½s of 1961 were selling just a short time ago yielding 4.92—a terrific return.

When we get into competition with this, the Treasury will say, "Oh, 3¾, that is what we thought we would utilize, but now we find we need to go up to 4½, 4¾, 5 percent."

If they really believed they were going to stay at 3¾, they would let the rates stay there until next January, and then come to Congress and ask Congress, which has the right to fix these rates, to give them whatever rate they might require. However, that is something they do not want to do. Why is it? Simply because they want to make sure that they take away from Congress any control of the financial structure of the country, and place it in whose hands? Into the hands of the people who have been gradually raising these interest rates for a long, long time.

It was pointed out that the budget is partly out of balance. Other things have helped to unbalance it, but it is partly out of balance because $2 billion is the cost of handling the national debt. So we raise these E-bonds up to the limit permitted by my amendment. That adds $425 million, but it also has an effect on every other piece of Government paper.

There is only one reason why these Government bonds happen to have yields of 4.69 percent. That is because new bonds have been issued. So that depreciates the old ones.

What does it do to every purchaser of a Government bond? What does it do to the people who in good faith allowed payroll salary deductions to permit them to buy E-bonds? They realize now that if they start to buy bonds that are heavily depreciated, they have taken a very substantial loss.

It was not too long ago that people used to point proudly to the fact that Government bonds were the finest investment that one could go into, to put into widows' and orphans' trust funds. But no one says that now because we find Government bonds selling as low as 81, and they do not have to have a long maturity.

So I say that I am completely opposed, and I hope Congress will be completely opposed, to turn over to the executive branch the arbitrary power to set the interest rates anywhere it wants to without reference to Congress, where that power is properly lodged.

The fact that the discount rate is below the 13-week, 91-day, interest rate is a dangerous situation, a phenomenon in our financial structure which should warn us not to fool around with the bond market at this time. When the return rates cross, when the return rate from stocks goes below the yield rate of bonds, we have always had financial trouble, generally within 18 months thereafter. That is a well-established financial trend. No one seems to worry about it. If we allow the bond rate to go anywhere it will, the stock market will continue to rise, and hence stock yields will continue to go down. Generally there is financial trouble—and there is now. This is no time to fool with such a situation. It is no time to say that we should have unlimited rates on bond issues.

I do not believe the question was clearly presented to the House of Representatives. There is nothing in the debates that indicates that the membership generally understood that it was abdicating congressional responsibility in this field and turning it over to the executive department. There is nothing in the House report that would indicate that. There is nothing to that effect in the testimony of the Treasury Department witnesses before the House committee. The testimony was to the effect that, "We have a plan to raise the rate to 3¾ percent." Under these circumstances we ought to refuse to give unlimited power. We ought to establish a 4¼-percent limit, which is more than adequate to carry the Treasury until next January; and we should do it by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I enthusiastically support the Anderson amendment. I agree that most Senators have not had the opportunity to have the very vital importance of this amendment called to their attention.

It was interesting to note, in the colloquy that when various Members of the Senate who oppose the Anderson amendment were challenged to defend their position, that there was no very strong, clear reason for rejecting it. There was some vague notion that if we were to adopt the Anderson amendment it would be necessary for the Treasury to go to 4¼ percent instead of 3¾. This was never defended, just asserted.

It seems to me that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico answered it completely when he pointed out that, according to that line of reasoning, if there were no limit on the amount the Treasury could pay on bonds, there would be a tendency for the interest rate to go to infinity.

We must emphasize over and over again that this is a spending measure. It has the same effect on the Treasury as any kind of backdoor skip-the-Appropriations-Committee spending bill.

The Senator from New Mexico has stated—and I do not believe he can be successfully contradicted—that the effect of passing the bill, even with the Anderson amendment, would be to require the Treasury to spend $215 million a year eventually in additional interest on savings bonds. The Anderson amendment would limit the spending to $425 million a year. Without the Anderson amendment, the sky is the limit. Instead of putting our fiscal house in order, this measure would blow the roof off.

I think it is desirable, once again, that Senators who have an opportunity to do so should take a look at the majority report on this amendment, because on the second page of the majority report the first paragraph under the head of "General Statement" sets forth the history of savings bonds. It points out that the savings bond program was initiated in 1935. In that legislation the maximum permissible interest rate of 3 percent was established for savings bonds held until maturity.

There was no change in the statutory limit until 1957. It is true, as the report specifies, that in May of 1952 the Treasury did increase the yield of series E bonds to 3 percent, from 2.9 percent; but it was 22 years, from 1935 to 1957, before it was necessary for the Treasury to come to Congress and ask for an increase in the limitation on the amount the Treasury could pay on savings bonds.

Now the Treasury is coming back once again, 2 years later. I submit that no one can very well argue that the Anderson amendment would interfere with Treasury flexibility, because it provides for a full 1 percent increase at the discretion of the Secretary. The Treasury representatives say they want only one-half of 1 percent increase.

On the basis of conservative assumptions—even if we assume that interest rates are going up sharply—it would mean that the Treasury would not have to come back for a year, 2 years, or 3 years, very likely. It is certainly desirable for the Congress to pass upon any policy adopted by the Treasury which would push interest rates on savings bonds to a higher level than 4¼ percent.

A higher level than 4¼ percent would mean that the rest of the national debt would have to be financed at around 5 or even 6 percent. In 1957 the Treasury asked for 4¼ percent. At that time the statutory limit was 3 percent. The Treasury said that if the Congress would give it 4¼ percent, that would be satisfactory.

At that time the House passed a savings bond bill which provided for a 3½-percent limit, but the Senate decided that 3.26 percent should be the maximum limit.

I invite the attention of Senators to the committee report of the Finance Committee, submitted on April 10, 1957, in which the Finance Committee said why it felt at that time that a statutory limitation on savings bonds should be required. On page 2 of that committee report of April 10, 1957, the Senate Committee on Finance had this to say:

> Your committee held 3 days of hearings on this bill—

I interpolate that there were 2½ days more of hearings than were held on the bill this year. The chairman of the committee stated, I believe, that the only hearings that were held were when the administration witnesses came in and testified. The opponents of the increase apparently were not heard.

I read further from the 1957 report:

> during which attention was given both to the recent deterioration of the market for savings bonds and to the potentially harmful effects on the economy of a program of high interest rates. Your committee has amended the House bill to lower the maximum rate permissible on savings bonds to 3.26 percent, in lieu of 3½ percent. This will permit the Treasury to sell a $75 bond that will mature in 8 years and 11 months, for $100.

The committee further stated:

> It is believed that this change is desirable, for several reasons. If a 3½-percent limit is provided, there would be some expectation on the part of the public that the rate would in fact be raised, and this would tend to reduce sales of the 3¼-percent bonds. Furthermore, this adoption of this reduction of the limit to 3.26 percent expresses the opposition of the Congress to any increase in interest rates not absolutely essential in the interest of economic stability.

That was the statement of the Finance Committee in 1957. I wish to emphasize that statement, because I think it is unfortunate that the Finance Committee, in its report this year, did not take the same position and express the same opposition to an increase in interest rates.

The committee report in 1957 stated:

> The adoption of this reduction of the limit to 3.26 percent expresses the opposition of the Congress to any increase in interest rates not absolutely essential in the interest of economic stability.

The committee went on to say this:

> The Treasury has argued that there should be greater administrative flexibility in the Treasury to raise interest rates if redemptions of savings bonds again rise relative to sales. Your committee does not believe that the situation requires such delegation of authority to the executive since this deterioration of the market for savings bonds has in the past developed only slowly.

Mr. President, what has changed in the past 2 years, between 1957 and 1959, that should persuade the Finance Committee of the U.S. Senate they should now delegate to the Executive unlimited power to increase interest rates to whatever extent they wish to increase them? I submit there has been one development. It is not a new development but it has been reinforced. That is the consistent, clear-cut policy of the Eisenhower administration to attempt to increase interest rates at every opportunity.

If there is any fundamental economic policy difference between the Democratic Party, which is the majority party in Congress, and the Republican Party, it is that the Democratic Party said in its platform, and in the pronouncements of its leaders, and in the expressions of the Members of the Senate and the House that "we do not believe in high interest rates. We are a low interest rate party. We believe interest rates should be kept as low as they can be."

Since 1957 interest rates have soared. The executive branch of the Government has demonstrated it believes in higher and higher interest rates. Under these circumstances, I can see no reason why, 2 years after the Finance Committee issued a statement in which they say, "We must not delegate this authority; we do not agree with the House that they should go to 3½ percent," we should say now that we do not believe in high interest rates. We want the Executive to come before us and make a case whenever they wish to increase interest rates on savings bonds. That was the position of the Finance Committee in 1957.

I submit it was a wise and a defensible position, and I hope it is the position the Senate will take tonight in voting on the Anderson amendment.

The position of the Finance Committee is the same as the position of the chairman of the Finance Committee in 1957. The chairman was the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. On April 15th on the floor of the Senate he said:

First was the question of whether or not there should be greater flexibility for the Treasury to increase interest rates on savings bonds if inflationary pressure should build up in the future. The Treasury originally requested that the statute provide that the savings bond rate could be increased to 4¼ percent, even though they had only announced plans to sell a 3¼-percent bond. The House bill would raise the ceiling only to 3½ percent. The Finance Committee has further reduced the new ceiling to 3.26 percent, which will be adequate to sell the bonds described in the Treasury announcement of February 14. Let me say that the action of the Senate Finance Committee is an indication that the committee desires to discourage further increases in interest rates in financing Federal obligations. We felt strongly that the serious aspects of higher interest rates require that any further increase should be accompanied by a request for legislation. Experience in the past has indicated that the market for savings bonds declines only slowly enough in an inflationary period as to afford ample time for additional legislation.

Mr. President, I am sure the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, who is an extremely able and sincere man, felt that the situation warranted the statement this morning that in his judgment conditions had changed.

I submit that anybody who looks at page 4 of the committee report and examines what has happened with respect to cash sales of savings bonds and cash redemptions of savings bonds in 1957 as compared with 1959 will find the situation has not changed. Indeed it is almost exactly the same kind of situation.

It is also interesting to note the apparent pattern. After the Senate and the House adopted an increase in interest rates in 1957 on savings bonds there was no improvement. There was no increase in the sales of savings bonds. There was no reduction in redemption for a considerable period of time. It was only after an aggressive campaign was conducted by the Treasury Department throughout the country generally that the increase in sales and the decrease in redemptions took place.

In 1957, when there were much more careful and thorough hearings on this measure and the principles behind the measure, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board appeared and testified. He was asked by Mr. MILLS, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, this question:

What merit is there to the thought that has been advanced by the lending and savings institutions of the country, commercial banks, building and loans, and mutual savings banks that there will be no opposition on their part to an increase from 3 to 3¼, but there would be cause for concern on their part in giving the Treasury discretionary authority to raise the interest rate on E-bonds to as high as 4¼ percent?

Mr. Martin, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, made a fairly long answer. I wish to call attention to the last paragraph of his answer:

I served in the Treasury for a couple of years and I happen to believe it would be wise to give them as much discretion as you gentlemen in your good judgment can see fit to give them without giving them blanket authority.

In other words, Federal Reserve Board Chairman Martin said, in effect when he was asked an explicit question, "Don't give them blanket authority. The Treasury should not have blanket authority to increase interest rates on savings bonds." That was a statement by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, who has such enormous prestige here. He was saying that the Treasury should not have blanket authority to increase interest rates without limit. I submit that without the Anderson amendment that is exactly what the bill before the Senate does. I challenge any Member of the Senate to show that the bill does not provide blanket, carte blanche, unlimited, complete authority, in contradiction of the recommendation of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board when he was asked how much discretion the Treasury should have.

Mr. President, I have examined the Senate hearings and committee report and have looked through the hearings in the House, which were substantially more exhaustive than those in the Senate. I cannot find any justification from Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board Martin, the committee report, issued under the name of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, from the proponents of the bill, or the outspoken opponents of the Anderson amendment, specifically, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], for providing unlimited, blank-check authority. There is no justification whatsoever.

There are plenty of arguments as to why interest rates on savings bonds must be increased, but that is beside the point. All of us agree that these interest rates have to go up. There is no question about it. We regret it, but it is a fact of life. They have to go up. But I say that the purpose of the Anderson amendment has been challenged by no one. There is no record of such a challenge in the hearings; there is none in the committee report; there has been no statement on the Senate floor.

If the Senate should reject the Anderson amendment and should pass the bill in its present form, there simply is no question that we shall be setting a clear precedent, so that next January or February, when the administration again asks for what President Eisenhower has insisted is so close to his heart that he is thinking of calling a special session for it—in other words, taking off the limit of 4¼ percent—the administration would say, "After all, you have done this for savings bonds; you have done it when 40 million bondholders are involved, and perhaps some 15 million or 20 million voters. Why not, if it is a matter of principle, do it for the institutions?"

Mr. President, there is no ready answer for that question.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very much impressed by what the Senator from Wisconsin has said. This issue is of overriding importance. If the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico should be rejected, it would break a historic precedent going back to the time of George Washington. It will be like the breaking of the dike, and there may be a deluge of high interest rates from which the country can never recover. So it will be incumbent upon the Senate, particularly incumbent upon those who feel so strongly about this matter, if the Anderson amendment is rejected, to propose several other amendments.

Furthermore, we should make clear and definite that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States cannot issue 5 or 6 percent 20-year bonds in the guise of savings bonds, so that they will not arrive at their ultimate objective of having no ceiling whatever on the carrying of the public debt.

The research I have made indicates that if we fail to establish the ceiling on savings bonds, we shall leave the Treasury and the President—not only the present ones, but all those in the future—to decide as they wish, and Congress will finally have abdicated its historic power and control over the interest rates. Congress will then have surrendered that power, in totality, to any President or any Secretary of the Treasury, and will permit them to pay any rate of interest they may find to be in the national interest—and we may find it in the national interest to pay 5 percent or 8 percent for 20-year money, if they so desire.

This is an obligation Congress can never avoid; but once Congress loses this power, it may never recapture it.

Certainly the Congress should be concerned with the protection of that power, which it has on the basis of a 180-year precedent. Certainly Congress should be most concerned whenever it is proposed that it break that precedent and give the President the power to fix whatever rate of interest he may deem to be in the national interest; and certainly Congress should consider very carefully before it agrees to lose the control it has, as the people's branch of the Government, in determining what rate of interest shall be paid on such Government obligations—a power which the Congress, rather than the President, has held up to this very hour.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. He is entirely correct; and it seems to me that the Senate should pay very careful attention to the implications of his statement. I enthusiastically agree with what he has said.

Certainly the Senate should be on notice that if the Anderson amendment is rejected, it will be absolutely incumbent upon us to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country to the most important principle that is involved.

I have prepared some 50 amendments; and I expect to call up some of them, in the event the Anderson amendment is rejected, because this matter is not one of a trivial, technical provision of a bill. Instead, this matter affects all the people of the country. The principle involved is absolutely vital. Members of the Senate who favor this amendment have the duty of talking about this matter very carefully, and of talking about it at great length, if necessary. That is we must talk for days, perhaps weeks, if the Anderson amendment fails.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARTHY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I find myself in complete accord with my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma pointed out something which I think all of us often forget; and I refer particularly to Members on the other side of the aisle—namely, that this authority is not being requested only for the present occupant of the White House. If this authority is provided, it will apply to future Presidents, regardless of their policies or their attitudes.

All of us know that the present occupant of the White House will serve only another 16 months. However, the legislation now proposed will be permanent, and will affect and apply to any President of the United States, and will give any President this power.

Mr. President, in the last 25 years there have been exactly two occasions when it has been necessary for the Treasury to change the interest rate on savings bonds. Does it make any sense to say that the administration must have flexibility, no limitation on interest rates, so they wont have to run back to Congress under these circumstances? Why is it so difficult for the administration to make such requests of the Congress? As a matter of fact, the administration has come back only once to the Congress in 25 years—only in 1957—between 1935, when the first measure of this sort was passed, and the present time, 1959. Only once in that period has the administration requested that the Congress increase the interest rate on savings bonds.

Mr. President, I conclude by pointing out that the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has stated in the most unequivocal terms that an increase in the interest rate on savings bonds will have a direct and immediate effect on the interest rates on all other obligations throughout the country.

At this time I should like to read from the hearings, at page 35:

Mr. MILLS. Say you and I operate a building and loan association, and Congress does this. The first thing we notice, some of our depositors have taken their money out and are putting it into these bonds. Good or bad, I am not arguing one way or the other on the point. I am just trying to see what will happen.

Our natural reaction then would be to increase our interest to our depositors, and the only way we could do that would be to charge more interest on our loans, as I see it.

Does that make it more difficult then for you to provide satisfactory restraints on inflation?

Mr. MARTIN. If the overall level of savings rises it does not make our job more difficult.

Mr. MILLS. It makes it easier?

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Mr. MILLS. Are you saying then that this may well have the effect of increasing the overall rate of interest?

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Mr. MILLS. It would have that effect?

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Mr. President, a plainer or clearer statement could not have been made.

The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, who is charged by Congress with the administration of the monetary policy, has stated what will be the effect of an increase in the interest rate on savings bonds; he has said it will have an overall, national effect on other interest rates—and that the effect will be to increase them. All of us recognize that there must be some adjustments; but it is now proposed that the present administration have unlimited power to increase interest rates on savings bonds as much as it may wish—and all of us know that it wishes to increase them a very great deal. However, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has said such an increase will have a nationwide effect, and that, as a result, all interest rates will tend to rise.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope the Anderson amendment is adopted, and I yield the floor.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I agree completely with the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin that this is perhaps the most crucial issue to be before the Congress at this session.

I regret that the press of the Nation is at this time represented in the press gallery by only four members. That is most regrettable, because the story of this issue has not been properly covered. It has not been accurately reported; and the public itself, as well as the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate, are not aware that we are being asked to completely remove the historical congressional power of Congress to fix the maximum ceiling on the interest rate, on long-term obligations issued by the Government.

Such a suspension of a 180-year-old precedent is worthy of more than 1 hour of casual consideration by the Finance Committee. It is worthy of more than the casual reporting it has received, which has been 95 percent inaccurate, in the newspapers of the country. Except for the Wall Street Journal, all the newspapers which I have seen have reported that the pending bill provides that the interest rate on savings bonds may be increased from 3¼ percent to 3¾ percent. But that is a completely inaccurate report, because the bill provides that there shall be no ceiling, and permits any figure the President may find to be necessary in the national interest in order to expedite the sale of savings bonds; and, although the bill will affect only the interest rate on savings bonds, I find, upon careful study of the bill and of the statute being amended, that the Secretary of the Treasury will be able to decide what savings bonds are.

As a result, the efforts of the House and the Senate to guard very carefully against excessive interest rates can be set at naught. The interest rate increase is deserved by citizens who hold a few savings bonds of small denominations. But by means of this measure the Secretary of the Treasury could determine, by regulation, whether a $50 bond, or a $100 bond, or a $500 bond at 3¾ percent—the rate at which they have been advertised—was a "savings bond," or whether a $10,000, or a $100,000, or a $1 million bond was a "savings bond." Similarly, under the provisions of the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury might decide to issue them, not for 7 years, or 10 years, but for 15 years or 20 years, if he so desired, and at a rate of 10 percent.

So we are boxing ourselves in if we permit the erosion of congressional authority that has existed in the past and which the Congress has held against every President from George Washington on down.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. GORE. From conversations in the cloakroom and in the dining room, I have come to feel that there is considerable misunderstanding about the purport of the Anderson amendment, the effect of the Anderson amendment, and the contents and provisions of the pending bill. The Senator has just stated that the bill, as reported and as pending before the Senate, provides no ceiling whatsoever on interest rates for savings bonds, nor does it provide a definition of savings bonds.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am sorry to say to the Senator that it does not. It leaves to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the determination of what a savings bond is. Any bond of not more than 20 years' maturity, of any denomination whatsoever, which is designated a savings bond has a ceiling unlimited in this "quickie" bill that is thrown in here in the closing days of the session, on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Such definition and terms as "interest rates," as the Senator has mentioned, have been in the past characterized either as E- or H-bond issues. Is that correct?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. We have carefully limited it, as the distinguished Senator knows, as to the interest rate, and we have jealously guarded control of these particular savings issues. But, as I read the bill, and as the experts have studied it, I find this bill is so cleverly drawn that, in spite of the fact that the House refused to provide unlimited ceilings on long-term Government bonds and sought to act on savings bonds, an avenue as wide as a barn door has been opened so the Secretary of the Treasury or the President—perhaps not this Secretary, perhaps not this President, but some future Secretary or some future President—can bypass the Congress completely as to ceilings, as to denominations, as to character of the bonds, and as to interest rates.

We find, on studying the bill, that the ceiling is unlimited, and as to the definition of savings bonds, it is up to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury or the President has the right to finance any portion of the public debt, up to 20 years, at any rate he desires to pay, whether it be 3¼ percent, 4¼ percent, 5 percent, or 10 percent. The country will be bound by its sacred obligation to pay off at that interest rate, whether it continues for 20 years or not. We would bind future generations to the folly of a high interest rate policy that has been foisted on us by an administration in its dying day and permitted by a Democratic Party which seems to be faltering in the principles of Jefferson and Jackson for which it has stood for its long history.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator agree with me it is very important that the Anderson amendment should be adopted?

Mr. MONRONEY. I think it is so important, I will say to my colleague and friend, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, that if the 4¼-percent limitation is not adopted, then the Senate should remain in session for whatever period of time is required for a thorough discussion and for consideration of many amendments, in order to try to prevent the complete erosion of congressional authority in this vital field. That authority has never been violated in our history, and I do not think it should be violated now, on the basis of a 1-hour hearing by the Finance Committee, without any public testimony from any source whatsoever.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. I am far more concerned with the present Secretary of the Treasury and the present President than I am with future ones.

Mr. MONRONEY. That would assume that we would elect a Democratic President who would be guided by the Jacksonian and Jeffersonian principle that interest rates are important; but, somehow, I wonder whether the Democratic Party and the Democratic leadership recognize the importance of interest rates in the historic position of our party.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. I am not so sure I share the assumption which the able Senator from Oklahoma has stated. I entertain the view that it would not be possible to have either another President or another Secretary of the Treasury who is as enthusiastically in favor of higher and higher interest rates as is the present administration.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is true, because everything that could be done to raise interest rates has been done by this administration, by Government edict.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. So the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from New Mexico is for the purpose of fixing a limit, and the limit proposed is 4¼ percent. Is that correct?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct; and it would make the rates uniform as to the limit now existing, and which has been in existence since 1918, on long-term Government bonds. The Treasury came before Congress and made its request, and the press bought what it said was the purpose of the bill by circulating throughout this Nation, to every newspaper reader, the story that there would be an increase in the interest rate from 3¼ to 3¾ percent; and now it is proposed to put in effect a limit of 4¼ percent, which provides a half of 1 percent leeway over what the Treasury itself asked for.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my colleague.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator feel that the principle of low interest rates is one on which all good Democrats can agree, whether they come from the North, the East, the South, or the West?

Mr. MONRONEY. If there is any one single point of unity in the Democratic Party, it is on this principle, which has come down from the party's founding father, Thomas Jefferson, through the historic battle of Andrew Jackson against the vicious control of monetary policy by the Bank of the United States, and by the Biddles of Philadelphia, which great city my colleague has served.

Mr. CLARK. Unfortunately, the Biddles were all Republicans, except Francis Biddle.

Mr. MONRONEY. But this is the cornerstone of the Democratic principles. If I were a teacher of political science, and my students asked me the fundamental difference between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, the one definition I could give would be that the Democratic Party historically has believed in high wages for people, for the farmers and the workers, but the Republican Party historically has believed in high wages for money. The one principle begets prosperity, when the wages of farmers and workingmen are good. The other policy begets depression. One can follow that trend through the long history of this country. The people of the country turn to the Democratic Party when they are in danger of a depression and calamity. They always turn to our great party because they know that in the prosperity of the many will there be sound economic conditions.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think the sooner we can find out how many Democrats are prepared to support Democratic programs by voting for the Anderson amendment the better it will be, so that those of us who intend to see that this principle is either supported by adoption of the Anderson amendment—or there will be quite a lot of discussion about the bill—can have our minds made up as to what we should do next?

Mr. MONRONEY. I appreciate the question of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I would say that historically, in the votes of the past—and I believe the Senator has been keeping books on this—from two-thirds to three-fourths of the Democrats have consistently voted against interest rate increases, tight money policies, and the escalation of interest on Government-guaranteed securities. Two-thirds to three-quarters of the Democrats in the Senate have consistently expressed their party's traditional and historic belief in low interest rate policies.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. Unfortunately, about one-third tc one-fourth of the Democrats in this body have joined with almost a solid 100 percent bloc of Republicans in a coalition to defeat a low interest rate policy.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I ask for the attention of Mr. Baker, as I ask the Senator this question: Would the Senator feel there would be any objection to my suggesting the absence of a quorum, so that we can find out how many Democrats will support the Democratic policy by having a quick vote on the Anderson amendment?

The Senator may not have been on the floor when the majority leader said he expected a vote on the Anderson amendment at about 7:20 p.m. Would the Senator object if I suggested the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MONRONEY. I would be happy to yield for the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Since the Senator from Oklahoma yielded for the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, does the Senator from Oklahoma still have a right to the floor?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Oklahoma may retain his right to the floor, at the conclusion of the call of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is out of order. The order for the quorum call has been entered. Unless there is a request to withdraw the order for the quorum call, the clerk will continue to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the Senator from Oklahoma losing his right to the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, as one who is very desirous of saving the time of the Senate, I should like to suggest that we probably would save time by granting the request, so I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. How far has the call of the roll progressed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is out of order. An inquiry of that type cannot be made while the roll is being called.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue to call the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded in order that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] may be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT, RELATING TO DISCONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN OPERATIONS

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, out of order, on behalf of myself and Senators BUSH, DODD, JAVITS, KEATING, and NEUBERGER, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 13a(1) of the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to the discontinuance or change of operations of certain trains and ferries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2659) to amend section 13a(1) of the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to the discontinuance or change of operations of certain trains and ferries, introduced by Mr. CASE of New Jersey (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

INTEREST RATES ON E AND H SAVINGS BONDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9035) to permit the issuance of series E and H U.S. savings bonds at interest rates above the existing maximum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain exchanges of Government securities to be made without recognition of gain or loss, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, when the quorum call was ordered I was saying that while the first section of the bill before us purports to deal only with saving bonds, it would amend sections of the code so that the Secretary of the Treasury or any future President would be unlimited as to interest rates as he now is in the matter of the denomination of savings bonds he might issue, and would be restricted only by a maximum 20-year maturity.

The bill would remove a ceiling which has been consistently maintained by the Congress against executive excesses through the long history of our country, from George Washington down to the present administration.

But we are proposing to open a door as wide as all outdoors, to provide for unlimited interest to be paid on long-term debt, by the passage of the bill before us.

If the amendment of the junior Senator from New Mexico is adopted we will effectively say that the 4¼ percent interest ceiling which has stood since 1918, in the days of World War I, will be effective not only with respect to long-term bonds, but also with respect to savings bonds.

The danger of executive excesses in paying interest has been recognized since the days of Thomas Jefferson. It was fundamental in the fight of Andrew Jackson against the throttling power of the Bank of the United States and the Biddles. It has been the crowning glory of the Democratic Party. If we forsake it on the basis of a 1-hour hearing before the Finance Committee, ostensibly to raise the interest ceiling from 3¼ to 3¾ percent, and buy the booby-trap that is before us, we shall be forsaking our constitutional duty.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. First, I wish to pay my tribute to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for the leadership he has provided and for the research he has made, going back to the time of the first President, showing to the Senate and the people that the unlimited grant of fiscal power to the Executive is really an abdication of the fiscal responsibilities of Congress.

I thank the distinguished Senator for rendering this service to this body, our Government, and the people. But aside from the duty which each individual Senator owes to his conscience and to the people, I ask the Senator if he does not believe that the Democratic Party, as a party, owes an obligation to the people under our Republic. The Democratic Party, under its platform pledges going back to Thomas Jefferson, for generation after generation, has been the protector of the people in fiscal matters. Do we not as a party tonight owe a high obligation to protect the American people in this matter?

Mr. MONRONEY. I could not agree more completely, or disagree more completely with the theory that the way to lower interest rates is to raise interest rates, which is the theory that has been expounded here tonight.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I would like to have the RECORD show that I think 100 percent the opposite. I believe that history may well prove that the result of our failure realistically to increase the interest rates on our bonds and other obligations may force the country into financial chaos. We would injure the very people Senators say they wish to protect.

I wish the RECORD to show that; and I wish the RECORD also to show that on this debate, and the action we may take here, may well depend whether this country has run-away inflation, whether we shall be forced off the gold standard, and have chaos in our fiscal affairs.

While Jefferson and others may have been right, conditions in those days were entirely opposite to what they are today. The facts today are that central banks and foreign people control the financial destiny of this country. That was not true under Jackson, but it is true today.

I plead with Senators, with tears in my eyes, to please permit the Treasury of the United States to set interest rates which are practical and realistic, and which will make certain that we do not throw the country off the gold standard.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator may think what he wishes, but I do not believe that the way to stop overeating is to order pie a la mode, or that the way to stop drinking is to have an extra pint of bourbon. I do not believe that the way to stop high interest rates is to raise interest rates. The Senator can believe what he wishes. Under Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson what was paid for Government money was not one-thousandth as important as it is today, when the magnitude of the $300 billion public debt fixes interest rates for the entire Nation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to my distinguished colleague from New Mexico, the author of the amendment now before us, which I hope all Senators will support.

Mr. ANDERSON. I may say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I was tremendously interested in the tear-wrung confession that we are going to get into financial trouble if we do not give the Treasury permission to correct the situation. We observe two financial circumstances which the Senator from Indiana has rarely seen: First, the Treasury's 13-week bill rate is above the Treasury discount rate or Federal Reserve discount rate. That is a phenomenon which rarely happens. When the Senator talks about financial confusion, that is it because the discount rate is 3½ percent, and the 13-week bill rate was this very week, yesterday—Monday—3.979 percent. We have never heard of that happening in this country.

Second, the financial writers have been pointing out for a long time that when the two lines representing bond yields and stock yields cross, and the stock yield drops below the bond yield, we are always in for some financial trouble if we are not very, very careful. Yet the administration wants to exaggerate that and make the bond yield still greater in an effort to bring about financial stability.

We are in some financial trouble, and we are in it because of the tight money policy which has made it extremely difficult for business to operate. Most people are very conscious of that fact.

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree with the Senator from New Mexico. There were periods in our history when weak Presidents surrendered to the power of the money market. I have never seen a more abject surrender than that of the present President of the United States to the moneychangers of the Nation. Strong Presidents have resisted this power to dominate fiscal affairs by control of other people's money in the deposits in banks and insurance companies.

Now we see the power of the money market control. Even the Federel Reserve System, which was established as a safeguard for the people's interest, today has more concern with the profits which it makes on rediscount, the profits it makes through the tight money policy, than it has with the responsibility which the authors of the Federal Reserve System intended be exercised when they created this great institution, the Federal Reserve Board.

Let me illustrate that point. The Federal Reserve Board, if it has a duty at all, is supposed to provide a stable money supply and also to prevent the violent upswings and downswings in our monetary policy. Since 1955, the Federal Reserve Board has reduced its long-term bond holdings—that is, bonds running 5 years or more—by 37½ percent. Today, the long-term bond holdings of this great institution, the central bank of America, amount to only $900 million. Think of that—$900 million in long-term bonds. But the Federal Reserve Board tells us that the greater the amount of holdings in long-term bonds the greater the stability of the public debt.

The commercial banks, which the Federal Reserve Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are supposed to advise, since 1955 have reduced their long-term bond holdings by 54.6 percent. The mutual savings banks and building and loan associations, which are supposed to provide a reservoir for savings, would be a wonderful market for our Federal bonds or long-term bonds, but they have reduced their long-term holdings by 26.2 percent.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I will yield in a minute, when I have finished my statement.

The insurance companies, which use not their own money, but the savings of the little people of America, have reduced their holdings of long-term debt by 25.6 percent.

Then who is holding on to the long-term Government bonds? I will tell the Senate. It has been the little people of America, a part of the 185 million, who are buying bonds on the savings and payroll deduction basis. These are the people who have confidence in U.S. bonds. These are the people whom the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico is designed to protect. The amount of their holdings of individual savings bonds has declined only 6 percent from 1955 until now. They are the people who are the backbone of America.

This is where the emphasis is. When the moneychangers refused to buy the securities of the United States, the people came forward and said, "We will lend our savings by way of payroll deductions." Certainly; perhaps it is possible to hijack a higher interest rate out of Uncle Sam by political machinations or Federal Reserve action, or by other means. But the little people are pretty well satisfied to ride with Uncle Sam, because they think their investment is important, is vital to the long-term stability of our Nation.

Of the other groups I have mentioned, the Federal Reserve holdings are down 37.5 percent; commercial bank holdings are down 54.6 percent; building and loan association and mutual bank holdings are down 26.2 percent; and insurance company holdings are down 25.6 percent.

What has happened? The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] in the Committee on Banking and Currency has consistently supported increasing the interest rate of the Siamese twin of the Government bond, namely, the Government-insured mortgage, which is backed by the credit of the U.S. Government, and which has almost the same security as a Government bond. The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and the agencies of Government have consistently asked for congressional authority to raise the interest ceiling on Government-insured mortgages. Obviously, the insurance companies are going to take their profit, the banks will take their profit, and the Federal Reserve will turn its back on Uncle Sam and will say, "We don't care what happens."

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why do people sell their long-term bonds, if it is not because the interest rate is much lower than it is on short-term bonds and on other securities?

Mr. MONRONEY. Because the Members of Congress are so unwise that we keep upping the rate on competing securities. The rate has gone upward since May 2, 1953, when the former chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency raised the GI rate to what was then an all-time high. The FHA rate went from 4¼ to 4½ percent, in May 1953. On May 5, 1956, there was a VA increase from 4 to 4¼. On December 3, 1956, the rate on FHA mortgages was raised from 4½ to 5 percent. On August 5, 1957, the FHA rate was again raised from 5 to 5¼ percent. Then the VA rate was increased, to 4¾ on April 4, 1958, and to 5¼ on July 2, 1959.

It is an open secret, all over town, that when Congress leaves Washington, the rate on FHA mortgages will be raised from 5¼ to 5¾ percent. This will make the payment a man will have to make on his mortgage 6¼ percent, because of the one-half of 1 percent rate for insurance.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why does the Senator expect a man who saves money—the little fellow, the wage earner, the farmer, or anyone else who will save money—to lend his money to the Federal Government at a rate lower than he can get in a savings bank or on Federal mortgages, when everything he buys at the grocery store, at the clothing store, and at the automobile dealer's has gone up, up, and up?

Why does the Senator wish to impose a penalty on a man who is thrifty and saves his money? Why does not the Senator encourage such a person to save his money? Why not give him a little more interest, and thereby stop inflation and the inflationary spiral? Why does the Senator wish to penalize the thrifty person? Why does he want to penalize the little fellow who puts his money in savings banks and in E- and H-bonds? Why does the Senator want to penalize the thrifty person in the United States, the fellow who will save?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Treasury representatives came before us and said their plan was to raise the rate on E- and H-bonds—bonds held by the little fellow about whom the Senator is talking—from 3¼ to 3¾ percent.

The Senator from New Mexico said, "We will give you a limit of 4¼ percent, which is one-half percent more than the Treasury wants to pay the little fellow." But I am afraid that unless we impose a limit we will raise what we intend to be an umbrella for the little fellow, and find all the great banks, insurance companies, and masters of great wealth will be under the umbrella instead; and we shall then be paying through the nose—5 or 6 percent. Whatever rate the President thinks is necessary in order to get money, the Government will pay it. There will be no ceiling. It will be ceiling unlimited. That is Republican policy. There will be no rate too high to pay as rent for the money.

Mr. CAPEHART. The people who have their money in the savings banks are the little fellows; those who own the insurance policies are the little fellows; and those who receive dividends are the little fellows.

Mr. MONRONEY. But the ones who control that money are the big boys; and they only need to have 12 men in New York to lunch to decide to raise the interest rate that will apply to the 170 million people of the Nation; and the Senator from Indiana knows it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. If there has to be protection for the little fellows at 3¾ percent, does any provision of the bill prevent that benefit from going to those who purchase luxuries, and who want to have the rate raised skyhigh? Does any provision of the bill prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from being extremely liberal, in the interest of those who hold large amounts of bonds?

Mr. MONRONEY. I have studied the bill. It would raise an umbrella under which the Secretary of the Treasury could issue $1 million bonds or $10 million bonds at any rate, provided they are not for more than 20 years' duration.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the Senator from Oklahoma know of anything that is more inflationary than constantly spiraling, constantly rising interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. Of course they are most inflationary. There has already been a $500 million increase in the estimated cost of interest on the debt this year; and now we are asked to go on a Republican sleighride by permitting the interest rate to be raised to 8 or 10 percent.

We are told, on the one hand, that subsidies and price supports for the farmers are very bad, indeed. But, on the other hand, the Republican policy is to pay high price supports for money.

This is a high price support bill, and it will allow the President at his will to fix any interest rate ceiling he may desire.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I repeat that all over the country it is well recognized by all that the price of groceries has gone up and up, and the rent bills have gone up and up, and the mortgage charges have gone up and up, and all other costs and charges have gone up and up—all except the interest rate on savings bonds. Can the Senator from Oklahoma tell me one reason why a man who has the courage to save his money should not receive an increase in the interest rate that is paid to him on the savings bonds he purchased?

Mr. MONRONEY. I will state why. I read the figures only a moment ago. The little lenders who have been purchasing E- bonds and H-bonds held, as of May 1959, $47.2 billion worth. Does the Senator from Indiana know how many long-term Government bonds the insurance companies—the insurance companies that the Senator from Indiana is crying about—held?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am not crying about them.

Mr. MONRONEY. They held $3.2 billion worth. Those are the insurance interests the Senator from Indiana is crying about. But the insurance people have disregarded their obligation to help create a sound financial condition. They ran away from purchasing such bonds; they failed to do their duty.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why does the Senator from Oklahoma say they have run away from purchasing them?

Mr. MONRONEY. Because they can make more profits by investing in the insured mortgages on which the Senator from Indiana has helped increase the rates.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has answered his own question, and now he should sit down. In other words, he has pointed out that they can make more money, more profits, by investing in other securities.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is because this Congress and this administration have insured such mortgages, at higher rates; and those insured mortgages yield by far a greater return than the return which investors can obtain from Government bonds.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I am opposed to increasing the interest rate on mortgages.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has introduced many bills for the purpose of increasing the interest rate on the mortgages insured by the FHA and for the purpose of increasing the interest rate on all other mortgages or securities which have been insured by the Government. I thought the Senator from Indiana is in favor of higher interest rates.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Earlier this afternoon, I pointed out to the Senate that from 1946 the commercial banks reduced their bond holdings from $96 billion to $63 billion—or, approximately $30 billion.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator from Ohio is talking about both long-term and short-term holdings; is he not?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. MONRONEY. The long-term holdings were much less. My figures show that in 1955, the long-term holdings amounted to $26.6 billion; but in May 1959, they amounted to only $12.1 billion—or a decrease of $14.5 billion, or a decrease of 54.6 percent.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My figures cover both the long-term and short-term holdings.

The Treasury bulletin of August 1959, shows that there are three segments of the economy that have reduced their holdings of Government bonds: first, the banks, which have reduced their holdings of Government bonds from $93 billion to $63 billion; second, the insurance companies, which have reduced their holdings of Government bonds from $24 billion to $12 billion; and, third, the savings and loan companies, which have reduced their holdings of Government bonds from $11 billion to $7 billion.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield briefly to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Ohio was using figures for the period from 1946 to the present time, whereas the Senator from Oklahoma was using figures for the period since 1956.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; and the Senator from Ohio has been using the figures for both long-term and short-term holdings, whereas I have been talking about the long-term holdings, which are comparable to the savings bonds.

Mr. ANDERSON. So the two sets of figures are not comparable.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand that.

The Senator from Oklahoma and I are in complete agreement that it is unpardonable for the banks and the insurance companies and the building and loan associations to reduce their holdings of Government bonds. They did so because of mercenary motivations; they wanted to make the largest profits they possibly could make. They decided they would make more money by investing their funds in other securities, rather than in Government savings bonds.

Mr. MONRONEY. Instead, they have invested in Government-insured mortgages and other securities which this Congress and this administration have been hasty to make available to them, at whatever rates they said they needed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I pointed that out this afternoon.

It is very interesting to note that practically all of the other segments of the economy have increased their holdings of Government savings bonds. State and municipal governments hold substantially more than formerly. The Federal Government, through its trust funds—for example, the railroad retirement fund, the social security fund, and other funds—hold substantially more now; and individuals throughout the country hold more Government savings bonds in 1959 than they held in 1946.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I commend the individual citizen for being willing to buy Government savings bonds, at a lesser profit than that he would have enjoyed if he had bought other securities. But, Mr. President, in my judgment, the banks, the insurance companies, and the building and loan associations have some answer to give to the people of the Nation.

Now I should like to ask my question of the Senator from Oklahoma:

Why have the banks, the insurance companies, and the building and loan associations reduced their holdings of Government savings bonds? If Government savings bonds were good investments and if they produced adequate profits in previous years, why have those classes of investors run away from Government savings bonds?

Mr. MONRONEY. Because the Government has been so gracious in dealing with the Siamese twins of Government bonds—namely, the Government-insured mortgages and other Government-insured securities. In the case of the latter types of investments, the Government has cycled up the interest rates; and thus the groups to which the Senator from Ohio has referred have decided that they would increase their profits by buying insured mortgages, on which the Government has constantly raised the interest rates.

For example, on the 2d of July, the interest rate on Government-insured mortgages on GI housing increased from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent. The Congress itself is helping to create this chaotic condition, by permitting the issuance of Government-insured mortgages which bear a much higher interest rate than do the savings bonds or the marketable bonds for the long-term Government debt.

In all my life I have never seen a worse example of fiscal mismanagement. There has been complete, abject surrender to the money markets of Wall Street and the insurance interests, who are investing in Government-insured mortgages and Government-insured securities, and are constantly demanding higher interest rates. In other words, the large investors have almost completely avoided their obligation to buy Government bonds, and they have created this situation. And now we are asked to break the historic pattern and precedent which has been in existence since 1918, as regards fixing the interest rates.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield, so that I may answer the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], for whom I have great respect?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why does the Senator expect a man who goes to the grocery store and finds the price of everything he buys has gone up and up and up, who finds that the cost of labor has gone up and up and up, who finds that the price of everything he buys has gone up and up and up, to lend money at the same interest rate, or less, than he did 25 or 30 years ago? Why is he not entitled to a little more interest rate, if he is thrifty enough to save money to lend to the insurance companies, to the banks, to the Federal Government, when everything else has gone up and up and up? Can anybody logically answer that question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the Senator from Indiana is asking me, I will say the answer inevitably is that we ought to have a higher interest rate.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is right.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to try to answer the question?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think one reason why the insurance companies and the banks have gotten out of the market is that most of them obtain the advice of investment counsel. I know some of the best investment counsel we can secure have advised us to get out of Government bonds, because they expected the higher interest rates would make it advisable to get into other investments, and that would help deteriorate the Government bond market to the point where those bonds would be selling at a very substantial reduction.

All one has to do is look at the Government bond quotations which come out day by day, or week by week if one subscribes to a special service, and he will see that the price of long-term Government bonds has gone down to the point where they can be bought for 80 or 81.

In short, while insurance companies and banks secure the advice of investment counsel, who have advised them to get out of Government bonds, the average individual, who does not have such advice, has stayed in the market and has taken the loss.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I want to repeat what I said a moment ago, that the insurance companies, commercial banks, and mutual savings banks have their lifeblood supplied to them by the people of the United States. They owe to the country, over and above the ordinary individual, an obligation to be unselfish and patriotic. In my judgment, they have abdicated that responsibility. They are looking at their business operations solely from the standpoint of making money, and they may someday find themselves in the position where, by their very conduct, they will kill the institution that has provided them with the tremendous financial success that they have enjoyed.

Now this question to the Senator from Oklahoma: There are in the United States individuals holding H and long-term bonds in the aggregate sum of $65 billion as of this date. In 1946 they held $64 billion worth. The holdings of individuals has increased. The individual holds more than he held.

My question is, Why should not that individual get a higher interest rate than he has been getting? He has been patriotic. He has bought bonds. Yet we are asking him to invest his money at a lesser rate of interest than he could get if he put his money in private corporation bonds, in savings and loan deposits, in common stocks, and in many other investments.

Mr. MONRONEY. This is exactly what the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico will do. It will not only permit the Treasury to raise the interest rate, as they say they will, from 3¼ to 3¾ percent, but will allow them to raise it to 4¼ percent should that become necessary.

The concern for the little investor is a screen for the fact that for the big investor this administration has a policy of "Ceiling unlimited, opportunity grandiose, because the Republicans may be out after 1960, and we have got to make a killing while we can."

Even with the Treasury's proposal, because of the sliding elliptical increase, an investor, in buying E-bonds, under the new Treasury proposal of 3¾ percent, would receive only 1 percent interest if he held the bonds only 1 year. If he held it a few more years, the interest would increase to 2 percent. If he held the bonds until maturity, he would get 3¾ percent interest. That is not competitive with the 4 percent interest which building and loan associations give. The little guy can always be shortchanged, but they had better be good to the big guys, because they are the ones who feed the peanuts to the Republican elephant.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I want to be nice to the little fellow, and I want those citizens who have written to me to get higher interest rates. I get letters which state, "I hold E-bonds. I hold H-bonds. Why do you expect me to have my money in Government bonds at this comparatively low rate of interest when I could make more in other places?"

That is why I want to make certain that the individuals who have been unselfish, patriotic, and decent to the country shall be paid an adequate interest rate on their investment.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is why, I will say to the Senator, most of these individuals who are so patriotic have left their money in at 3¼ percent. I think it is about time we held their head a little above water and it is time to give them a little increase. It is not much. It will not compare with the rate of interest that the life insurance companies and commercial banks are getting on short-term Government investments, 4¾ percent. Let us hold their heads a little above water. That is all the Anderson amendment will do, but it will prevent the big guys from ganging up on the Government and saying to it, when it needs money, "Pay through the nose."

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. In just a moment. That is why we see the small people with $47,200 million invested in E- and H-bonds, and why we see the great insurance companies, which have been increasing their reserves by billions of dollars, getting out of the market, to the point where the insurance companies have only $5,800 million worth of Government bonds, against the $47 billion that the little guy has put in. That is why the mutual savings banks have only $4½ billion worth of bonds, against $47,200 million for the little man.

The little man manages his own affairs and investments, and he believes in Uncle Sam. Yet those who manage these vast insurance companies, who have no personal interest in the investments, and who manage $50 or $60 billion, have invested only $5,800 million in longtime securities as a means of defeating inflation in the United States. They can put only $5,800 million of all the money they control into long-term Government bonds.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to my distinguished colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I hope the persuasive Senator from Oklahoma will allow me to suggest that perhaps it is a truism rather than a generality to indicate that historically, then and now, the Democratic Party has been and is in favor of the men and women who live on Main Street rather than the individuals who perhaps preside over Wall Street.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. CAPEHART. What does a man pay for a $100 E-bond?

Mr. MONRONEY. He will pay today $75.

Mr. CAPEHART. He pays $75 for it?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. At the end of 10 years he will get $100?

Mr. MONRONEY. He will get the $100 a little sooner now. It takes about 8 years and a certain number of months.

Mr. CAPEHART. Approximately 10 years.

Mr. MONRONEY. No. It is 8 years and some months. There is a little difference. Perhaps the Senator wants to pay the man off in 10 years, but I think he ought to be paid off in about 7 years.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not a fact that the whole argument is over whether or not the holders of the E- and H-bonds, who are the savers of the Nation, the people who are thrifty, the people who save their money, because the cost of everything they purchase has gone up—the cost of groceries, the cost of clothing, the cost of shoes, the cost of automobiles, and labor, and everything else—are entitled to a larger interest rate? Is that not the whole problem? Is that not what the debate is all about?

Mr. MONRONEY. No. The debate concerns in part how much money this little man should receive. We give him 60 cents on a $100 bond the first year, under the present program. In 2 years it is $2.92. After 3 years it goes up considerably, and we give him $7.

I am ready to support the Williams proposal, which will provide almost a straight 4 percent interest, so that we will not shortchange the little people.

I do not believe that the insurance companies, the mutual savings banks, and the commercial banks are going to invest the little man's money and give him a great return. I am sure the Senator is aware that the interest rates have been skyrocketing. Has the Senator ever heard of anybody who has an insurance policy who has received any bonus because this close little coterie, which holds the vast billions of dollars of funds, has been able to yank interest rates up a little more?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Indiana asked the Senator if the whole issue was whether these people should get a little more interest. I do not think that is the issue at all.

The Treasury Department representatives testified before the House and the Senate committees that its plan was to increase the interest rate from 3.26 to 3¾ percent. Therefore, that is not the issue at all.

The issue is whether, in order to get the interest rate up to 3¾ percent, we are to give unlimited authority for the Treasury Department to fix rates on many other types of bonds at any rates it chooses, or whether we are to hold them to a ceiling of 4¼ percent.

The statement has been made repeatedly by people who have been visiting around that this is an argument as between 3¾ percent and 4¼ percent. It is not that at all.

According to the program of the administration, the holders of these bonds are going to be paid 3¾ percent interest. They might get even 4 percent interest. They might get even more than that.

The statement which has been made is that the Department ought to come to the Congress if it wants to go above the level of interest which it has a right to pay on the other bonds. The administration does not want to have to do that. The administration wants to have complete authority from the Congress, for 20 years, to establish any sort of interest rate it chooses. That is what is causing the argument.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not a fact that the gentleman, at the beginning, for the E bond pays only $75 for a $100 bond?

Mr. ANDERSON. Surely.

Mr. CAPEHART. The interest is on the $100, not on the $75.

Mr. ANDERSON. It still was only 2.90 percent. Now it is 3.25 percent. It will go up to 3.75 percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator's amendment would allow the interest rate to go to 4¼ percent, but we do not want to let it go as high as the moon.

Mr. CAPEHART. What we ought to do is permit the Secretary of the Treasury to set the interest rates on the bonds at rates which will be fair to the investors and which will insure the solvency of the United States, by permitting the bonds to be sold on a long-term basis. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Oklahoma will recognize that the Treasury Department in its testimony before the Senate never asked for that authority on the E and H bonds.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. Let me read from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUSH. I do not quite understand what the Senator meant if he said that the Treasury Department is not in favor of the removal of the ceiling on the long-term open market bonds. Is that what the Senator said?

Mr. MONRONEY. No.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator had listened, he would not have to ask that question. That was not what I said.

Mr. BUSH. I merely wished to make sure.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator understands thoroughly what I said. If the Treasury Department wanted this authority so badly, why did it not come to the Senate and ask for it.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make an observation, the Treasury Department did make a statement that it wanted it, before the House committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. I said, if the Treasury Department wanted it so badly from the Senate, why did it not ask the Senate for it? The Senator from Connecticut knows the Department never asked for it at all.

Mr. BUSH. I say to the Senator that the only reason the Department did not ask for it is that it felt, I am sure, when the Department representatives came before the Senator's committee, that it had to make a deal, where it could get as much of the loaf as it possibly could get. The Department saw the handwriting on the wall, exactly as the Senator can see it, and exactly the way I see it tonight. That is the only reason. That is the only reason the Treasury Department did not ask for it.

Mr. ANDERSON. My answer was, to the Senator from Indiana, who stated what Congress ought to do, that if the Congress ought to do it, the Treasury Department ought to come to the Senate and ask for it. This is not a volunteer organization.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator knows as well as I do—I put it into the RECORD today—the views of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, and what the President thinks about it. I put the President's statement of August 25 in the RECORD, and on September 3 the Secretary of the Treasury said the same thing. They both want the removal of the interest ceiling on the open market bonds, and they ought to have it.

Mr. MONRONEY. When the bill before us was before the House of Representatives we could find no explanation to the Ways and Means Committee as to why the Department wanted an unlimited ceiling, so that it could provide any interest rate the President might feel was necessary in the public interest to finance the sales of E- and H-bonds. We find nothing in the record to justify an unlimited ceiling. It was never mentioned. The witness was talking about a 3¾ percent ceiling on the interest on these bonds.

Even the press of the country, represented by those in the Senate and House press galleries, missed this point. Only one newspaper I have been able to find was sharp enough to pick up the fact that we were asked to give an unlimited ceiling for interest on E- and H-bonds. That newspaper was the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUSH. There must have been something persuasive before the Committee on Finance, because the committee reported the bill favorably.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator well knows that the bill was written downtown and handed to the committees, as is the habit in such cases.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance was explaining the bill this morning, and said that the bill would raise the interest rate from 3¼ to 3¾ percent, and I had to ask the Senator to yield, to ask the question, "Would the section permit an unlimited ceiling on interest rates?" and the Senator had to admit that it would.

Mr. BUSH. Yes.

Mr. MONRONEY. There is nothing in the bill which mentions a 3¾-percent interest rate.

There is only one paragraph of the report of the Committee on Finance, which the committee happened to be willing to insert in a tailormade report by the House committee. That is the only change I can find which was made by the Committee on Finance.

I think the Senate has an obligation to look at these things and not simply to rubberstamp the action of the House of Representatives.

On page 8, we find the only paragraph that differs from the House committee report.

I point out further that the Secretary of the Treasury stated in his testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee on June 10, 1959, in the hearings on the public debt ceiling and the interest rate ceiling on bonds, on page 4, the following:

> Let us look at some of the competitive phases of our problems. Federal Government programs to guarantee home mortgages for veterans and to provide FHA insurance on various types of mortgages have contributed to the unprecedented volume of homebuilding in America since World War II. But they have also fostered a marked improvement in the quality of mortgages as investments for the billions of dollars that Americans each year save out of their earnings—savings which they invest directly of which insurance companies, savings banks, savings and loan associations, or pension funds invest in their behalf.

In another paragraph the Secretary of the Treasury stated:

> There are a great many other debt obligations outstanding today which our Government also aids in one way or another, including securities issued by many Federal Government agencies, even though those securities are not actually guaranteed by the U.S. Government. While the volume of long-term Government-aided obligations has been growing—

I interpolate to say that in 1946 we had $117 billion of long-term U.S. Treasury bonds outstanding, and $6½ billion of what might be called the long-term Government-aided debt outstanding—

> Twelve years later—December 31, 1958—the $117 billion total of long-term Government bonds had shrunk to $65½ billion, while the $6½ billion Government-aided total had grown to $58½ billion—$55 billion of which is in FHA and VA mortgages alone.

This is the point I repeatedly returned to, and the distinguished Senator stated on the floor a year and a half ago, and stated on the floor last year, that if we would give them an increased interest rate, we would stop any necessity for it if we would just enact it.

We have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD here before us, and I can read the whole colloquy. It was said that this was not going to mean higher interest rates for veterans or higher interest rates for FHA; but it always has. We have put the Government-insured and Government-aided bonds, the other Siamese twin, on an escalator. The real Government bond has ridden the escalator up just one step behind, and we have ourselves created the chaotic condition in which we find ourselves, with this administration and Congress continuing to raise interest rates because of the pressures we have from the money market that money ought to have a little higher wages; that money ought to be better paid; and threatening to go on strike if they do not have it. So we have this difficulty in financing the public debt because we have made more attractive the other Siamese twin, the Government-insured loan.

Mr. BUSH. Does the Senator think a mistake has been made with respect to increasing the attractiveness of the insured loan?

Mr. MONRONEY. I said on March 12, 1958, when we were talking about this subject:

> Does what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said illustrate the wisdom of the theory of throwing the baby off the sleigh, to the wolves? Or if the baby is thrown to the wolves, will the result merely be that the wolves will return, all the hungrier?

So we throw more babies off the sleigh. We have more and more demands for interest with each succeeding baby that is thrown off the sleigh.

I cannot subscribe to the policy that the way to reduce the fantastic increases in the cost of carrying the public debt, which is an increase of $2,500 million under this administration, which buys absolutely nothing, no arms, no hospitals, no schools, no medical research—$2,500 million for what Cal Coolidge used to call the rent on money. We have managed to raise our rent on money under this administration by astute Government action, by all of the agencies of the Federal Government, by $2,500 million during this administration, and it has gone up $500 million since January 1, when the Treasury and the Budget sent up their estimate for increased costs.

Mr. BUSH. May I ask the Senator; the Senator has been here all this time in the Senate——

Mr. MONRONEY. And I protested against every interest rate increase, which the Senator from Connecticut has supported. He won each round, and I lost each round.

Mr. BUSH. Does the Senator think that we made a big mistake?

Mr. MONRONEY. I believe the Senator is down to homecoming, when he is paying.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator has not heard my question. I wonder whether the Senator believes that we made a big mistake in creating a situation whereby the guaranteed obligations of the Government have mounted from $6 billion-plus up to upwards of $50 billion plus. Those are the figures the Senator quoted.

Mr. MONRONEY. They have gone from $6½ billion to $58½ billion, $55 billion of which is in FHA and the VA mortgages.

Mr. BUSH. That is right. I wonder if the Senator thinks that has been a mistake.

Mr. MONRONEY. No. I am against the increased rate. I think we should have had the courage to say, "These are Government-insured securities. It ought to be worth something to have Government insurance behind them."

We can borrow on the conventional market uninsured in Washington cheaper than we can borrow on FHA and GI.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senator would yield, I should like to follow his argument. It is very interesting. If I follow it closely, what he is saying is he does not favor this new offer of $55 billion of guaranteed obligations, and really we should have held the interest rate down.

Mr. MONRONEY. If we had held the interest rate down, we would have been able to sell them at a lower interest rate, and the GI's would have had housing for thousands of dollars cheaper. We would not have found ourselves in a self-created Government condition of competing with ourselves in the Government-insured mortgages.

Mr. BUSH. I would simply observe that if we had held the interest rate down on these Government-guaranteed obligations, they would have had to go into FNMA if that amount of obligations had been sold, because the open market would not have taken them.

Mr. MONRONEY. The open market would have taken them if the Senator and those who have raised the rate had not been so eager to rush forward and collect. The difference between a strong President and a weak President through history has been that a strong President will resist the demands of the money market and those who can control the finances and the resources of this country. I give the Senator the fact that Democratic Presidents historically have used the powers of Government to keep interest rates low and Republican Presidents historically have caved in at the first demand for higher interest rates.

Mr. BUSH. I congratulate the Senator on his statement about the Presidents of the United States. That is an appraisal I had not heard before.

Mr. MONRONEY. Perhaps the Senator is not familiar with the policies of Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson. I am sure he is familiar with all the writings of Mr. Hamilton, who thought we ought to get all the interest that the money changers could ask for.

Mr. BUSH. In contrast, may I say to the Senator that I am one of Thomas Jefferson's most ardent supporters and admirers, and I bow to nobody in my admiration for his philosophy of government, specifically for his published statements and writings concerning the fiscal affairs of the United States.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am sorry the Senator does not endorse the writings of Jackson.

Mr. BUSH. I am not quite so familiar with them.

Mr. MONRONEY. I doubt the Senator from his experience in Wall Street would support anything that Jackson did.

Mr. BUSH. I would say to the Senator, "Do not be too sure." [Laughter.]

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. For the purpose of information, am I correct—and I direct this question to the experts on the floor—in my understanding that in the sale of short-term obligations and certificates, there is no interest limitation now in the law; that for obligations up to 5 years there is no limitation with respect to interest?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. However, there has been a historic interest ceiling on long-term bonds from the beginning of our country. During the administration of George Washington, the Adamses, Jefferson, and all through the years we have had an interest rate ceiling put on by Congress. That is a part of the constitutional duties of Congress. Each bond issued was authorized by Congress. The interest rate it was to carry was voted by Congress. That was the situation until World War I, when we were having so much financing done that Congress decided to trust Carter Glass, the distinguished predecessor of the chairman of the committee and former distinguished Senator from Virginia and great Secretary of the Treasury, as well as coauthor of the Federal Reserve Act. During his incumbency as Secretary of the Treasury, in the renewed financing necessary in connection with World War I, Congress trusted Carter Glass as to the amount of bonds to be issued. At that time Congress fixed the ceiling at 4¼ percent. That is where the ceiling has been maintained all these years, unviolated, until this very hour, when, in the closing days of the session, with no more than a half hour of hearings before the Committee on Finance, without the Treasury pointing out any cause for going above the 3¾ percent on H-bonds we find that we will be violating something that no Congress before has ever violated, and we will be giving the President powers which no previous President has ever enjoyed.

Unless the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico limiting the ceiling to 4¼ percent, which is one-half percent more than the Treasury says it wants, is adopted, I believe we had better discuss the matter for a long time, so that posterity, as it looks down on the records of the Senate, will not say that we were stampeded in the closing hour of this session to violate a centuries-old tradition, but that the Congress preserved its powers and did not allow itself to be stampeded into hasty action.

I yield the floor.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, on previous occasions I have strongly endorsed prompt action on the request of the Treasury Department to remove the present fictitious 4¼-percent ceiling on long-term Government bonds.

With long-term Government bonds selling in the open market at discount prices wherein an investor can get 4½ percent or higher, it is absurd for the Congress to maintain a 4¼-percent ceiling.

Certainly we do not want the Treasury Department to resort to selling Government bonds at a discount in order to bypass the 4¼-percent ceiling, nor do we want the Government to do all of its financing on a short-term basis. Either course would be highly inflationary.

We are confronted, however, with a situation here today wherein it will be impossible to consider the necessary legislation to raise this ceiling on long-term bonds, and the Finance Committee has agreed to confine this bill to an increase in the interest rates on savings bonds—E and H.

It is necessary that we place strong emphasis upon the need for financing a larger percentage of our national debt with the people through increased sales of savings bonds—series E and H. This would be far less inflationary than financing all our debt through the banks.

On July 31, 1959, the cash value of outstanding E and H bonds was $42,679 million, with $37,977 million being in series E bonds. The fact which gives all of us great concern, however, is that these savings bonds are presently being redeemed at a much faster rate than they are being sold.

In every month of 1959 redemptions of series E bonds have far exceeded the sales, with the figures for the month of July being the worst. In July 1959 sales were $297 million, or $24 million less than the sales for the same month in 1958, while during that month redemptions were $479 million, or $78 million higher than July 1958. Redemptions were $182 million higher than sales.

Sales of series E bonds for the full fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, were $3,688 million against redemptions for the same period of $4,889 million, or a loss of over $1 billion.

It is generally recognized that it is far less inflationary for the Federal Government to finance its debt with the people than with the banks; therefore, this trend is of serious concern to all.

As I pointed out in my earlier remarks, however, we must be realistic and recognize that there are reasons why the American people are cashing in series E bonds at a faster rate than they are buying them.

Those reasons are very simple and are, first, fear of inflation; and, second, investors can get a higher rate of interest by placing their savings in the banks or in other investments than they can in series E bonds.

At the present time series E bonds are paying only 3.26 percent interest, and unless the law is amended that is the highest rate permissible on this type of savings bond. The Treasury Department has sent a recommendation to the Congress that this permissible rate be raised to 3¾ percent. This is a step in the right direction, but I question that this will restore these bonds to their former popularity.

This trend, wherein redemptions of savings bonds are higher than the sales, must be reversed and this can only be accomplished by making these savings bonds the most attractive investment in America.

It is my opinion that we made a mistake when we departed from the standard 10-year maturity date for savings bonds. At the present time there are $38 billion outstanding series E bonds, some with 10-year maturity dates, others with 9 years and 8 months, and today they are being sold with an 8-year 11-month maturity date. The result is that investors holding these bonds are completely confused as to when they actually do come due.

My recommendations are that, first, these series E savings bonds be sold on a full 10-year maturity basis; second, they be sold at a price that will yield the investors 4 percent interest compounded annually; and, third, the redemption value of these bonds be placed on a higher graduated basis so that if they are cashed prior to the maturity date they would still give the investor all his principal plus a reasonable rate of interest.

I make these recommendations for the following reasons:

First I think the investors will like a 10-year bond better than one with an odd maturity date. It will be much easier for the investors to keep records of when their bonds come due, and it will be easier for them to plan their investment program.

Second to yield 4 percent interest compounded annually a 10-year $100 bond would be sold at $67.50. Bonds of other denominations would be priced in proportion. It is my personal opinion that investors would prefer buying a $100 bond for $67.50 with a 10-year maturity date rather than paying $75 for a $100 bond with maturity somewhere around 8½ years.

Third. I recommend a more attractive cash-in value for the bonds when redeemed prior to maturity. I do not think it is fair to this type of investor, who may through unexpected illness or misfortune be forced to redeem his bonds, to be required to lose practically all of the interest. For that reason I am recommending that the bonds be given a cash-in value which, while the investor would lose some of the interest, would always give him all of his principal plus the most of his interest. He would not be locked in his investment as under the present plan.

This more liberal redemption value plus a 4 percent interest rate, along with an understandable 10-year maturity date, will in my opinion make these bonds once again the safest and most attractive investment in America.

Why shouldn't these bonds be made more attractive? Remember they are being sold to the working people of America, and the Treasury Department has the authority to limit their sales to each individual.

Under my proposal these 10-year bonds would be sold at $67.50 for each $100 par value. Their cash redemption value would be increased $2.50 per year for each of the first 3 years, $3 per year for each of the next 3 years, and $4 per year for each of the last 4 years, or a maturity value of $100 with the redemption value broken down on a 6-month basis.

I concur with the Treasury Department that any increase we make in the rates applicable to the new series E and H bonds must be made effective on the same date for all outstanding series E and H bonds provided they are held to full maturity.

This could be done by making all outstanding series E and H bonds eligible for the new rate of interest on that portion of the unexpired term remaining after the effective date of the increased interest rate. Our failure to take such action would encourage a wholesale cashing in of those bonds or investors would convert the old bonds to the new bonds with the higher interest rate, and this would defeat the purpose.

However, the increased interest rates would be applicable on the old bonds only for that portion of the unexpired term remaining after the effective date of this change and only provided the bond would be held to full maturity.

I am incorporating in the RECORD here today a chart embracing my suggestions for the new 10-year bond which I propose be sold at $67.50 for each $100 par value; and I would appreciate the Members of Congress and other interested parties examining this proposal and feeling free to make any suggestions.

I recognize that this suggestion may not be the perfect solution, but realizing that something must be done it is being advanced for consideration.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table of this suggested 10-year 4 percent savings bond which would be sold at $67.50, $100 par value. The first column shows the proposed redemption value broken down in 6-month periods. The second column shows what the actual 4 percent interest compounded annually would represent. The third column is the suggested value of the bond at the end of each year.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Savings bonds—10 years, 4 percent compounded annually

Proposed redemption value after bonds have been held—		(Actual) 4 percent interest compounded	Value end of each year	Annual increase
		[1] $67.50
6 months	$68.75	2.70

1 year 6 months	71.25
2 years	72.50	73.00	72.50	$2.50
		2.92

So the bill (H.R. 9035) was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CIVIL FUNCTIONS, 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 9105, the civil functions appropriations bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 9105) making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the Tennessee Valley Authority, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] to explain the bill.

Mr. President, may we have the yeas and nays ordered on the passage of the bill, so all Senators may know a vote is in prospect? This is the civil functions appropriation bill, as passed by the House, in which they have restored 67 new starts, but reduced appropriations by 2½ percent.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader has stated what the House has done. I wish again to advise Senators that the bill is identical with the bill which the Senate passed a few weeks ago, and which was agreed to in conference. The only difference is that an across-the-board reduction of 2½ percent has been made on all projects, but that means that the 67 unbudgeted new projects that were added to the bill will remain in the bill in the same form in which it was agreed to in conference.

I wish also to state that the moneys for surveys and all other items will remain just as they were in the bill passed by the Senate and agreed to in conference a few weeks ago, with a reduction of 2½ percent.

Mr. President, I expect to demonstrate that the President has been ill advised on the effect of the increases in the bill originally presented to him. The President refers to 67 unbudgeted projects estimated eventually to cost over $800 million, of which 52 are Corps of Engineers projects and 15 are Bureau of Reclamation projects. Of the 52 Corps of Engineers projects there are 5 resumptions of construction having a total estimated cost of $218,550,000. The largest of these resumptions is the Allegheny River Reservoir, having a total estimated cost of $113 million.

In fiscal year 1958 the President recommended $1 million to initiate construction of the Allegheny River Reservoir. In fiscal year 1959 he recommended funds to continue that project. In the current fiscal year the President stated in his budget:

> It is anticipated that funds presently available will be sufficient to finance the Allegheny River Reservoir, Pa. and N.Y., in 1960, pending settlement of court action concerning the acquisition of lands required for the project.

Inasmuch as the legal problems in connection with this project were pending in the Supreme Court at the time the budget was submitted, it was not illogical to refrain from requesting additional funds for this project at that time. However, since the budget was submitted, the Supreme Court has denied a review of the case.

The Corps of Engineers testified that they could economically use additional funds for the construction of this project during fiscal year 1960, and the Congress recommended funds for that purpose. I do not believe that by any stretch of the imagination the Congress did violence to the President's program or incurred any future commitment. In fact, the President's 1960 budget contemplated expenditures for this project, and such expenditures are included in the President's estimated total expenditures of $1.1 billion mentioned in the veto message. Still, in the veto message this project is included as a new start and about $110 million is included in the $800 million future commitment which the message criticizes so severely.

I believe that the President's advisers are so confused that they have him muddled on his own program.

The resumptions added by the Congress are:

	Benefit-cost ratio	Total estimated Federal cost	Appropriation to date	Allowance
Arkansas: Beaver Reservoir [1]	1.1	$56,100,000	$1,291,000	$1,500,000
New York:
Buttermilk Channel	N.A.	2,910,000	1,359,000	1,500,000
New York-New Jersey pierhead line	1.4	5,740,000	4,429,000	500,000
Ohio: Muskingum River Reservoir	N.E.	40,800,000	40,185,000	500,000
Pennsylvania: Allegheny River Reservoir [1]	1.3	113,000,000	2,733,000	1,400,000
Total		218,550,000	49,997,000	5,400,000

[1] Added by House.

When we eliminate the resumptions, we find that the future commitment is about $600 million instead of $800 million.

Mr. President, I know of no place except a classroom where a person can be 25 percent wrong and pass with a grade of 75 percent.

When you consider some of the other aspects of the veto message, I doubt if the President's advisers could pass even with a grade of 70 percent.

In the next paragraph we find the following statement:

> Without any of the unbudgeted projects provided for in this measure, 1960 expenditures for the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation will reach $1.1 billion—an all-time high and almost three-quarters again as much as the expenditure level in fiscal 1955.

The President's advisers may pick the periods they desire to compare and get one result; but if we take another period we come up with an entirely different conclusion. For instance, in fiscal year 1950 the President recommended $1.1 billion for the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. In 1960 the President recommended $1.1 billion for these agencies. In the intervening 10 years the cost of construction, as reflected in the Engineering News-Record Cost of Construction Index, increased 66 percent. Therefore, in order to maintain a program equivalent to that of 1950, an appropriation of $1.8 billion would be required.

Let us consider some of the other factors that have changed in recent years. The latest period for which all of the comparable figures are available is 1950–58. During this period the national income increased 51 percent; the population increased 16.6 percent; and the appropriations for the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation were 9.6 percent below actual expenditures for 1950, and 25 percent below the budget request for 1950.

Considering the above paragraphs it is obvious that any straight dollar comparison is fallacious. The purchasing power of the dollar has decreased, while the population, which is a measure of the need, has increased.

Moving on to the next paragraph of the veto message, the President charges that over 200 unbudgeted starts have been added by the Congress during the last 4 years. In discussing this bill on a previous occasion the President has referred to the fact that his 1960 program included funds for 296 projects. Now, if the Congress had not added the 200 unbudgeted projects referred to by the President, we would probably have the Public Works program cut down to about the size his advisers would like. Considering the Corps of Engineers alone, the program for 1950 recommended funds for 312 projects. The program for 1960 recommended funds for 186 projects. The request included $61 million for the completion of 40 projects. If no new starts are added, there would be 146 projects in the program for 1961, 58 projects in 1963, and 29 projects in 1965.

Of the 186 projects in the Corps of Engineers program for 1960 as recommended by the President, 96 were added by the Congress during the past 4 years: of which 41 were initiated in 1959; 20 in 1958; 11 in 1957; and 24 in 1956.

Referring back to the number of projects, 40 of them would be completed with the funds requested in the President's program and the conference bill contemplates the resumption of 5 projects, reimbursement to local interests on 4 and the initiation of 43 new projects with a total future commitment of $380 million. Confining ourselves to actual facts, $380 million may sound pretty high; but when you consider that the amount appropriated for construction on Corps projects is about $735 million, you find that the future commitment in the conference bill for the Corps of Engineers was less than a half-year's construction. Obviously, if you don't feed new starts into the pipeline each year, the program is going to dry up.

Later on in the message the President states that "overspending in respect to water resources is hurtful to the United States and to the proper development of these resources themselves." Mr. President, both the Corps and the Bureau of Reclamation have testified to the need for these projects. There have been local interests from all parts of the country testifying to the need. Perhaps this testimony could be discounted on the basis of selfish needs of the area or the desire of these two great Federal agencies to maintain themselves in business. But Mr. President, in June of 1959 the Department of Commerce issued a report on water resource development. In that report it was pointed out that, taking the period 1954–75, there was a requirement for a total investment of $214.1 billion, of which $53.4 billion is Federal and $160.7 is non-Federal. Of the Federal investment, $28.2 billion is for navigation, flood control, hydroelectric power and irrigation. That means an average capital investment of $1.34 billion a year, which is about one-third above the alltime high of less than $1 billion for construction recommended for fiscal year 1960. It is apparent that the average for the remaining 15 years must be well in excess of the $1.3 billion 21-year average previously referred to if we are to meet the known water requirements which will be needed by 1975.

Water resource projects are never presented in their true light. They are capital improvements which pay dividends in one way or another to the American people. Navigation projects result in cheaper transportation and open up new areas in industrial and agricutural development. Flood control projects indirectly return benefits to the Federal Treasury. Flood damages are deductible in income tax filing. The water supply features of a project are fully reimbursable with interest. Power revenues are deposited directly into the Federal Treasury. For instance, from Corps of Engineers projects $74,983,894 was deposited in the Treasury in fiscal year 1958, of which $72,492,500 were from power revenues. The actual construction expenditures in that year were $529,989,985. About 13.6 of the funds expended in that year for construction were actually returned to the Treasury from projects previously completed.

I believe that the Congress is acting with responsibility in the field of water resources when it recommends a modest number of new starts, as it did in the public works appropriation bill this year. The bill vetoed by the President, as previously stated, provides for 43 new construction starts having a total future commitment of $380,030,000. These 43 projects have received careful consideration by both the House and Senate committees. I would like to call the attention of the Senate to one project in particular, the Gering-Mitchell Valley project in Nebraska. The Congressman from the district, in appearing before the committee, made the following statement:

> I feel that of all the projects that are under construction or about to be constructed, this one takes top priority in my district and is most critically and urgently in need of assistance.

Both of the Nebraska Senators testified before the committee that they had personally gone over the area, sometimes in the wake of destructive floods, and that it almost breaks one's heart to see the vast tracts of fertile, valuable land just dissolve into nothing each time a rain of any degree comes along. Their testimony was supported by that of local witnesses from the area. Both the House and Senate conferees were convinced of the urgent necessity of proceeding with construction on this project in fiscal year 1960. I cannot conceive of some anonymous bureaucrat convincing them that, and I quote from the veto message:

> By any sound test of urgency, these projects should not be started this year if we are to have a responsible Federal fiscal policy.

I am certain that the President has never been acquainted with the true facts in connection with this project or the other new starts provided for in the bill approved by the Congress.

If we believe in the future of this country and in an orderly development of its resources. I urge the passage of H.R. 9105, the public works appropriation bill for fiscal year 1960.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Louisiana and the other members of the committee are to be commended for the services they have performed for the Senate in the consideration of the bill. The committee has brought back a bill, which the Senator from Louisiana has now reported.

I think it is very important that we send this bill on its way to the White House at the earliest possible moment, so that the President can consider it. I trust he will sign the bill. In case he exercises bad judgment and does not sign the bill, we shall have time next week to consider the veto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there are 67 new starts in the civil functions appropriation bill. Fifty-two of those are under the jurisdiction of the Engineer Corps, and 15 under the jurisdiction of the Reclamation Bureau.

Of the 52 projects under the Army Engineers, 2 of them are not authorized,

1 is a repayment item, 1 is a lump sum item, and 15, according to the last report I have had, are not ready for construction.

With respect to those under reclamation, one is not authorized, six are on a small loan basis, and as to eight of them, construction could proceed.

I had hoped that perhaps a compromise could be arrived at. The question was discussed, I am frank to say, at the White House this morning. In fact, we had a long discussion with the President; and when he indicated his interest in the subject, as a matter of principle, he was very reluctant to accept the House version, even though there was a 2½ percent reduction in all projects.

The reason for the objection on the basis of principle is the impact there will be on future budgets. It might very well be said, of course, that the President will not be occupying the chair of Chief Executive after January 20, 1961, but that does not diminish his interest in the public well-being, or in the economy as such.

I thought the President was rather emphatic this morning in indicating that unless there was some modification of the bill, it probably would meet his disapproval. I am rather unhappy about that. I do not like to put words in the mouth of the President of the United States; but I am of the opinion that if the bill goes to the White House in its present form, it may, very conceivably, be subject to another veto.

I can understand the President's position. There has been some difference of opinion as to whether the impact in the future will be $500 million or $800 million, but the Budget Bureau advised me this afternoon that they felt quite certain of the figures they furnished to the President, which were used in his message of disapproval before.

So the only difference now is that the House has reduced the amounts involved by 2½ percent in the case of all projects, but the unbudgeted starts still remain in the bill.

I made the suggestion that perhaps if the new starts could be undertaken at the option of the President, with the understanding that every new start should be put into operation prior to June 30, 1961, that would meet with the favor of the White House. I am advised that probably it would. There came an alternative suggestion that did not seem to be agreeable; and then I made still another suggestion that I hoped would probably invite the approval of the President. It was indicated there were 20 projects of the 67 on which starts could be made even in the fiscal year 1960.

There were 20 more which could be put in the construction operation before June 30, 1961. That would account for a total of 40 out of 67 projects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will yield after I finish one more sentence.

With respect to the remaining 27 projects, they were to be diffused and distributed so that the impact on the budget would not be too great.

That seems to be an unacceptable proposal, but I felt that I ought to make that statement on the basis of the discussions we had this morning with the President of the United States, to make very clear to the Senate his feeling in the matter.

I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. When does the President's term expire?

Mr. DIRKSEN. After January 20, 1961, President Eisenhower will no longer exercise authority.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. By what authority, then, would he determine that we could have 20 additional projects after January 1961, and even into 1963?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The only authority of course, Mr. President, is a long-range view with respect to the orderly development of the resources of the country, and the impact of the program on future budgets.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But President Eisenhower would not have anything to say about that, if he were no longer President. As I understood the proposal of the Senator from Illinois, it was that we would leave all 67 new starts in the bill, and the projects could be started at the discretion of the President, provided they were all started within 2 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. After the Senator from Illinois explained that to the chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee dealing with civil functions, he countered with the suggestion that since the President would not be President for 24 months we would leave the 67 new starts in the bill, and leave the starting of them to the discretion of the President for the time that he will be President, or for the next 18 months. I understand that the Senator submitted that proposal.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And that was not agreeable.

Mr. President, I would be willing to go along with, and I think the parties concerned in the House committee and the leadership would be willing to go along with, leaving the 67 unbudgeted starts in the bill, and leaving it within the President's discretion as to when to start them, provided he started them during his term of office. However, to leave it in his discretion to start them in some other President's term of office is stretching it a little bit too far.

If the Senator is willing to amend the bill by providing that we will leave it in the President's discretion for the rest of his term of office, then that would be perfectly acceptable, but we do not think that the outgoing President would have much discretion a year after he has left the job.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. What does the Senator means by "new starts" or "unbudgeted starts"? Perhaps I should know the answer, but I am not sure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There are 67 new construction projects which the House approved and which the Senate approved, which the Budget Director did not approve.

Mr. CAPEHART. Will they not be approved at some future time?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is entirely likely that they will be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Congress has approved them already. It depends upon whose Budget Director is in charge.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why is the Budget Director's judgment better than the judgment of the Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We do not think it is. If we had relied on the judgment of the Budget Directors for the past century we would have had very little construction going on. We would have had no new starts.

Mr. CAPEHART. These are starts for future construction?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. They would be made next year.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why does not the Congress have as much right to make new starts as has the Director of the Budget?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We think the Congress not only has the right but has the obligation and the duty to do so, and Congress has been exercising that obligation and duty in the past few years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, it should be pointed out that since 1955 our expenditures in this field have jumped from $500 million to more than $1.1 billion a year, and they will jump in the future, on the basis of the impact of the new starts upon the budgets for 1961, 1962, and subsequent years.

The President of the United States must have a proper regard for the orderly development of our resources. The President must have a regard for our fiscal position. The President is to be complimented and commended for the fact that even though he will go out of office on the 20th of January 1961, he does not want to fasten upon some future President very heavy obligations in this field which will add up to an unbalanced budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How can a President who is about to go out of office assure the Congress that he intends to do something after he has gone out of office?

Mr. DIRKSEN. He cannot do so, after he has gone out of office.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is what is proposed. It is 20 in fiscal year 1960; 20 in fiscal year 1961, after the President has been out of office 6 months; and another 27 after the President has been out of office 18 months.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The big point, Mr. President, is that the President of the United States is looking down the road. The President is not thinking merely of the 20th of January 1961, when he will go out of office, but he is thinking of his responsibilities in regard to the impact of the program upon future budgets in future years.

If some previous Presidents had had an equal regard, we would not have had a budget out of balance by $9 billion when we came into office under President Eisenhower.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. But one of the first things we had to do was to take that budget and chop it apart.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think there was excess of expenditures over estimated revenues of $9.7 billion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does not the Senator think that we ought to do some chopping on the $12 billion budget which is out of balance now?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That budget is beyond us at the present time. The Senator is speaking now about the budget for the fiscal year 1959.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Surely.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is not true of the budget for fiscal year 1960.

Let me say, parenthetically, that I hope we will do a better job so far as expenditures are concerned in keeping the budget in balance in 1960, because I am not too sanguine about the prospects of having a balanced 1960 budget, when we look not at the appropriations but at the expenditures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much over the budget estimate is the bill we are about to vote on?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the Senator refer to the bill which is before us now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I refer to the pending bill. How much is it over the budget estimate for this year?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator knows it is not anything over the budget estimate. It is about the same.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is why every project was cut 2½ percent, so that we would meet the President half way and come down to the President's budget figure. We cannot have dictation by the Budget Director, saying, "Cut out this project, and that project; you can have only the projects the wisdom of the Budget Director may dictate."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, if that logic prevails, instead of 67 projects why not provide 200? Why not put 300 projects in the bill? Instead of $1.1 billion, why not make it $2 billion? We could diffuse this program all over the country, as a matter of fact.

We have at once both a fiscal problem and the problem of developing the resources of the country. The President has been mindful of the problem, not only up to the end of his term, but for the years which will follow. That is the President's responsibility, as the Chief Executive, because in the period between now and the 20th of January 1961, we could very conceivably put a potential load upon future budgets which would insure an unbalanced budget for years to come. The President would be remiss in his duty indeed if he failed to measure up to his responsibility in that regard.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to state a premise and then ask a question of my able and distinguished friend.

If these new projects are eliminated, North Carolina, instead of getting about $1.8 million, will receive only approximately $188,000, recommended by the President, out of the total budget of approximately $1.2 billion.

I should like to ask my able and distinguished friend from Illinois: If the President is looking down the road, will my friend ask the President to look down the road far enough to see North Carolina and to realize it is one of the 50 States of the Union?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I say to my distinguished friend from North Carolina that there are some unbudgeted projects for the State of Illinois in the bill. I have already heard by letter, telegram and telephone from people who are interested. The sacrifice Illinois must make will certainly be equivalent to that which will be made by the State of North Carolina.

This is not a case of taking a provincial interest and a provincial viewpoint. We must think in broad terms about the whole country. That is the President's responsibility.

After all, I can think in terms of the the benefits which will accrue to the State of Illinois. Others can think in terms of the benefits which will accrue to their States.

But the President is elected by all the people and must have a proper regard not only for the instant budget but for future budgets and for the proper development of these resources.

So I present to the Senate only what the discussion was this morning, and how deeply the President feels about this subject on the basis of principle. I am a little unhappy, of course, and would be unhappy if the President sought to veto this measure and then return it for such action as both branches of Congress might take.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think the Senator also should inform the American people, who may have some impression that Congress pulled these projects out of the air. These are all projects, are they not, which the Army Engineers have looked at? They have been authorized. They have a benefit-to-cost ratio in some cases of 2 to 1. They are not only bringing about conservation, but also producing taxes. I think the Senator should also inform the American people, on behalf of the President of the United States that the Committee on Appropriations is now considering the bill for mutual security. In that bill $739 million is provided for what we call defense support. It is nothing but public works in foreign countries.

I will not vote against that provision, but it seems to me the American people ought to have the benefit of some real facts and figures. Surely, if we can afford to vote $800 million, or close to it, for foreign public works, we can afford to have $800 million spent for development and conservation in this country for the creation of wealth which will pay taxes over a period of years. I think the American people ought to know that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Of course, Mr. President, I am not insensible of that argument.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I am not saying it is an argument. I am saying that the American people ought to know that; and I am for both programs.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should be most delighted, of course, to see that every American citizen is fully advised on that point, but I will not let it obscure the logic of the situation.

When we speak about these projects, we are thinking about the country as a whole in terms of its security, its defense, and its survival.

This is quite a different thing. We can come to grips with domestic projects at any time, but I present the argument to the Senate for whatever it is worth. Now let the Senate work its will on the bill.

Of course I know the overwhelming majority by which the bill in its present form passed the House. I would be the last to minimize it. The vote was 302 to 93. There is a 2½ percent cut in all the projects. That was not the important consideration at all in the discussions we had with those at high level as to the future of the bill. The whole question is one of unbudgeted starts and the impact upon future budgets; and on that point I believe I know pretty well what is in the President's mind.

I rest the case, Mr. President; and we can proceed to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

So the bill (H.R. 9105) was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CARROLL subsequently said: Mr. President, I hope the President will give serious consideration to the bill just passed by this body. In his last budget message, he said that although the cost of unbudgeted items will be relatively small in 1960—about $50 million—their ultimate cost will be more than $800 million. The facts are that more than $200 million of that amount is repayable. This amount will be returned to the Treasury as income from reclamation projects.

I say to the President and his advisers, with respect to the bill passed by the Senate tonight raising the rate of interest on savings bonds, that I think it would be worth while to take warning from the remarks of Sylvia Porter in her article entitled "Tight Money Is Back," published in the Washington Evening Star of May 25, 1959. Sylvia Porter said, in the first paragraph of that article:

> We are now reentering a cycle of tight money.

I remind Senators that this statement was made in May. I continue:

> This one will be, according to all reliable signals, the toughest in this Nation since the bank panic of the early 1930's.

Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIGHT MONEY IS BACK

(By Sylvia Porter)

We are now reentering a cycle of tight money.

This one will be, according to all reliable signals, the toughest in this Nation since the bank panic of the early thirties.

Already, the price of money—the level of interest rates—is the highest in a quarter-century and it is heading higher. Already, many loan applicants are finding it more difficult to get credit, and the clampdown will be rougher in the months ahead. Already, bonds carrying low coupons sold by the Treasury, States, cities, and corporations in the easy-money cycles of the past have sunk to record lows and are moving lower.

This is what tight money means: a period in which most borrowers must stand in line to get credit, in which many are turned down flat or granted only a part of the cash they want, and in which all who do get loans must pay heavily for them.

Tight money happens when the demand for credit tops the supply of money available in the Nation's pool for loans.

It happens when the economy goes into an upswing and as a result, businessmen want to borrow more to add goods to their shelves and expand their plants, homebuilders and homebuyers want to borrow more to finance houses, millions of consumers want to borrow more to buy cars, appliances and the like, States and cities want to borrow more for essential public works, etc.

It happened when the Federal Reserve System refuses to add enough money to the credit pool to take care of the increased loan demand because the Central Bank is convinced that if all who want to borrow can do so easily, the prosperity will become an inflationary boom.

The conditions I've described above have been emerging clearly for months, are now unmistakably dominating the money markets.

What will this cycle of tight money mean to you?

To homebuilders and homebuyers: Mortgage money is going to be the most expensive in years, and the stated cost of many mortgages is likely to be a lot less than the real cost. Although costs will vary from area to area there is no doubt the lid will be on mortgage money, and many homebuilders are simply not going to get the financing they need to go through with their plans.

To business borrowers: The highest-rated corporation cannot get a loan for less than 4½ percent today—and hidden extras are raising the effective borrowing rate to well over 5 percent. Less established, desirable borrowers are paying more, of course. Now, the probabilities are many loan applications will be cut, others will be refused.

To States and cities: Lenders are demanding 3½ percent and more even on the tax-exempt securities of the highest-grade municipalities. Increasing numbers of States and cities will find that the legal limits on what they can pay for money will bar them from borrowing.

To buyers on the installment plan: They'll pay more for loans on autos, appliances, etc. Although the real charges will be hidden in the small print and rates will vary violently, costs will be definitely up.

To corporations selling bonds: They'll be placing the fattest coupons in years on new bonds and be glad to get buyers for them.

To holders of outstanding bonds: Prices of bonds they bought in the past will be down because new bonds will be coming out with higher coupons.

To the Treasury: It'll pay more than 4 percent just for short-term loans of a year or less.

To banks: They'll make more on the high loan rates and fat coupons on new bonds, but they'll be in a squeeze too because they won't have sufficient cash to meet loan demands.

To savers: They'll gain because financial institutions will be paying higher rates to attract more and bigger savings accounts.

The tight money phase of 1959 to 19?? is shaping up even now as more restrictive than that of the summer of 1957, just before the recession of 1957-58. And that money pinch was brutal to countless hundreds of thousands.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I have before me another article written by Sylvia Porter, and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 8, 1959—this evening. It is entitled "Big Money Squeeze Begins." I read the first two paragraphs:

> A cycle of the tightest, hardest-to-get and most expensive money in a generation has just begun.
> A credit squeeze of a magnitude that will dwarf the pinch of prerecession 1957 and which will be beyond anything ever known by the majority of Americans is in the making.

I read the concluding paragraph:

> Other nations have known this sort of credit clamp down in modern times but this Nation hasn't. We have moved into an historic money squeeze.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIG MONEY SQUEEZE BEGINS

(By Sylvia Porter)

A cycle of the tightest, hardest-to-get and most expensive money in a generation has just begun.

A credit squeeze of a magnitude that will dwarf the pinch of prerecession 1957 and which will be beyond anything ever known by the majority of Americans is in the making.

A test of the ability of the Federal Reserve System to brake the boom without breaking it through strict credit controls will be seen in this country this fall.

The financial institutions of the United States are facing a severe strain. The lid is being clamped on credit at a time when demands for the credit are soaring on every side to unprecedented peaks.

CREDIT TIGHTENED

Last week saw the unmistakable signal of a new turn in the credit screws. Here's what's going on:

(1) Leading corporations have been notified by their banks that from now on they must pay 5 percent for short-term loans. Simultaneously, their bank lenders are requiring them to maintain a specified percentage of the amount they borrow on deposit.

This requirement means the corporations won't have the full use of the cash for which they are paying 5 percent and it will raise the real cost of their loans to 6 percent or more.

(2) Any day now, banks will have to pay 4 percent for money they borrow from the Federal Reserve System to fill loan demands of their customers. At the same time, the Federal Reserve will screen banks applying for temporary loans with mounting care.

This will mean that even banks willing to pay the 4 percent rate won't be able to borrow large amounts for any length of time.

(3) Mortgage rates are climbing to and through the 6 percent mark, and in some areas they'll reach 7 and 8 percent even on sound conventional mortgages.

HOUSING FACES SCARCITY

More effective than the steep rate in flattening the upswing in housing will be the increasing scarcity of mortgage money.

(4) Installment loan rates will rise to all-time highs too, although the costs often will be hidden in the totals of the monthly payments asked. A definite factor in the price of new cars to millions of buyers this winter will be the rising cost of financing the cars.

(5) More and more States and cities will have to postpone major public works projects because they are prohibited from paying more than a certain interest rate for loans. In this period, the rates demanded on their loans will be above what they are allowed to pay.

(6) Many speculators will be pushed out of the money markets. With money so tight, lenders will be rationing credit—and they'll tend to favor old customers over new ones, a large, established borrower over a small, risky one.

(7) The Treasury will be paying 4 percent or more for 3-month loans, 4½ percent or more for 6-month money. There's no telling what it may have to pay for 1-year money next month.

Other nations have known this sort of credit clamp down in modern times but this Nation hasn't. We have moved into an historic money squeeze.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that additional articles on the subject of the current credit squeeze also be printed in the RECORD, and that my entire remarks with these inclusions be printed immediately following the vote on the public works appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The articles and editorials are as follows:

STIFFER INTEREST RATES—CRASH PROGRAM TO JUGGLE U.S. DEBT MAY HAVE IMPACT ON ALL BUSINESS—LIFTING CEILINGS ON FEDERAL BONDS MAY MAKE PRIVATE BORROWING MORE COSTLY—SWITCH AWAY FROM STOCKS?

(By Alan L. Otten and John A. Grimes)

WASHINGTON.—The Eisenhower administration is putting together an urgent program designed to help solve Uncle Sam's mounting debt problem by allowing the Treasury to pay higher interest rates on Government securities.

These proposals, which would be of broad significance to the general economy, may go to Congress this week. They would:

Eliminate, or at least increase, the 4¼ percent interest rate ceiling on marketable securities due in more than 5 years.

Remove, or at least raise, the 3¼ percent ceiling on Treasury savings bond interest rates.

Raise the debt ceiling itself to $290 billion or $295 billion. Under present law the debt limit drops on June 30 to $283 billion from the existing temporary limit of $288 billion.

TIGHT MONEY DEBATE

President Eisenhower's request, if current thinking is followed through, would intensify the congressional debate on what Democrats call the Government's tight money policy. But the best judgment in Congress yesterday was that, after all the shouting, the legislators will go along with some increase in the interest rate ceilings.

High officials insisted that no final decision has been reached on asking Congress for more leeway in fixing interest rates. But congressional leaders, after a secret White House meeting Monday night, agreed there was no doubt the administration, finally, has just about decided to ask Congress for higher interest rate limits.

If Congress approves and the Treasury then boosts the interest rates it offers on its securities, the impact could be broad:

Businessmen almost certainly would face higher bond borrowing costs; the Treasury competes directly with them for funds.

As interest rates rose on Treasury and corporate bonds, a growing number of investors might switch funds from the booming stock market into bonds.

Higher savings bond interest rates could stimulate lagging sales of these securities and perhaps induce banks and savings and loan associations to offer higher rates to savers.

Payment of higher interest rates would boost the Treasury's debt management costs, already a sizable budget item.

If the Treasury steps up sales of long-term securities, this action, like higher sales of savings bonds, would aid the administration's fight against inflation.

MORE LONG-TERM BONDS?

The administration's concern over inflation is one factor that is pushing it toward asking for higher interest rate ceilings. With higher ceilings, Treasury officials believe they would be able to sell substantial amounts of long-term securities to nonbank investors. In recent months, the Treasury has been relying chiefly on short-term issues, which are purchased largely by commercial banks.

When a nonbank investor buys a Government security, he pays for it by taking funds from his bank; the total money supply is unchanged. When a bank buys a U.S. security, it pays for it by setting up an account on its books for the Treasury. As the Treasury draws checks on this account to pay for goods and services, the money supply grows. If the money supply grows faster than the supply of available goods and services, the result is inflation.

Sales of more long-term securities also would benefit the Treasury in a highly practical way. As the average maturity of the debt increased, the Treasury would have to make fewer trips to the market to refinance existing securities. It also would have more control over the timing of new issues; with maturities spread further apart, the Treasury would find it easier to step into the market to refinance an issue in advance if it decided market conditions were favorable. The whole debt management job would be simplified.

COMPETITIVE FACTORS

The Treasury in recent months has had difficulty selling long-term securities for two reasons: Investors' worry over inflation and growing competition from stocks and corporate bonds. For example, underwriters today are offering to the public $50 million of Public Service Electric & Gas Co. 30-year bonds at a price to yield the investor 5 percent—well above the top yield available on Treasury bonds.

Many private investors have been buying stocks heavily in preference to either corporate or Government bonds. Such investors reason that inflation would push up the prices of stocks along with the value of all other property.

With business recovering the Treasury faces the prospect of increasing private competition for the lender's dollar. The Treasury also is running into growing competition from State and local borrowing on securities whose interest is free of Federal taxes. Interest on U.S. Government securities, of course, is taxed both by States and by Uncle Sam himself. Still another potent competitor for Treasury bonds is the Government-backed housing mortgage, which yields 5 percent or better.

If the Treasury offers long-term bonds at higher interest rates, the first result would be a drop in prices of existing Treasury bonds and a resulting rise in yields on such securities. "If the Treasury offers a 4½-percent long-term bond—and they'd have to offer at least that much to find many buyers—prices of other Treasury issues would fall by two to four points," predicts one New York City bond dealer.

"If the Treasury offers higher rates, businessmen will have no choice—they'll have to boost their rates if they want to sell any bonds," says a New York City banker.

"If the Treasury gets the authority, it will use it," says a New York bond market specialist. "I foresee a 4½-percent Government issue, and that will tend to boost yields throughout the bond market."

The competition between Government bonds and corporate bonds is direct. A rise in yields on Treasury bonds would induce many investors to buy such securities in preference to corporate bonds—unless there was a corresponding rise in yields on the corporate issues.

The competition between stocks and bonds is less direct, especially in a period such as the present when inflation fears are a major factor. But it is nonetheless present.

The stock market declined sharply yesterday on the news that the Government's interest ceilings might be lifted. The Dow-Jones industrial average fell 6.06 points from the previous close to 637.45. Brokers theorized that the selling pressure that pushed prices down yesterday came from investors and traders who were speculating on the impact of a boost in Government bond interest rates. According to the brokers, the investors and traders figure that higher Treasury interest rates would lead many investors to switch from stocks into bonds and thus put downward pressure on stock prices.

HIGHER YIELDS IN BONDS

Treasury bonds already offer higher yields than many common stocks. The most recent calculation showed that the 30 stocks comprising the Dow-Jones industrial average were selling to yield an average of about 3.14 percent, compared with the yield of well over 4 percent available on existing longer term Government bonds.

Before the Government offers long-term marketable bonds at higher interest rates, it should first boost the interest rate on savings bonds, many New York City bankers say. "The savings bond structure, which is very important to the economy, is teetering," says one banker. "If all that money slips away, what does the Treasury do then?"

Savings bonds outstanding at the end of April totaled $50.8 billion, down $1.4 billion from a year earlier. Savings bond redemptions for some time have been exceeding sales as individuals have found more profitable ways to invest their savings.

Many savings and loan associations are offering 3½ percent and more to savers, compared with the 3¼ percent rate on savings bonds. "If the Treasury boosted the savings bond rate," says one New York banker, "it could put some pressure on savings and loan associations and banks to boost their rates, too."

CUTTING THE DEBT

In addition to considering higher Treasury interest rates, President Eisenhower and his subordinates are thinking more and more of using any Treasury surplus to reduce the mammoth debt rather than to provide tax relief. To a lesser extent, this same sort of sentiment shift is discernible in the House and Senate.

The switch to debt reduction can be gleaned between the lines of public pronouncements of Treasury Secretary Anderson, Budget Director Stans, and Mr. Eisenhower himself. Just recently, Mr. Stans raised the question, "When will we ever begin to reduce our $285 billion public debt" if it isn't done in these prosperous times?

To a large extent, the debt program explains the Administration's drive to balance the budget for the fiscal year that starts next July 1. And to some extent, it also accounts for the slowdown in Congress of Democratic determination to force the President to spend more than he wants to spend. Continued budget deficits would add to the Treasury's already heavy chores of refinancing present issues as they fall due.

The Treasury's idea of asking for a higher interest rate ceiling on marketable securities in itself indicates Mr. Anderson would like to begin selling long-term bonds again. But officials insisted yesterday that, even with complete freedom, they'd have no idea of a wholesale switch into long-term securities. And the Treasury, like any other borrower, likes to get its money as cheaply as possible. Interest rates on short-term securities are well below those on longer issues.

"We'll look largely at the short-term area for the next few months," remarks one Treasury official.

BEHIND THE PROPOSALS

A look at the Treasury's debt predicament explains the urgency behind the legislative proposals now being prepared. In calendar 1958 the Government had to borrow $19 billion in cash, in addition to issuing $50 billion of new marketable securities in exchange for maturing debt, excluding the regular weekly bill sales. Of this $69 billion, only $2.9 billion went into long-term bonds. So far this year the Treasury has borrowed $14 billion in cash, in addition to $14.1 billion to replace old securities. Of this $28.1 billion, only $1.5 billion has gone into long-term securities.

For the rest of this calendar year alone, the Treasury will have to borrow an estimated $10 billion just to bridge the gap between current expenses and tax revenues. In addition, about $29 billion—again excluding Treasury bills—comes due and has to be either paid off or refinanced.

Financial authorities, both in and out of the Government, agree the Treasury would be unable to borrow this kind of money without sticking largely to short-term securities.

When Mr. Eisenhower came into office in January 1953, one of his major financial aims was to tidy up the debt—to lengthen out maturities, for example, and to place more of the debt in nonbank hands. Candidate Eisenhower emphasized his debt aims during his 1952 campaign, including the debt problem in his summation of "the mess in Washington."

On June 30, 1953, a few months after Ike took office, the total debt stood at $266 billion. The average maturity of the marketable debt was 5 years and 4 months. Of the total $65.3 billion was to mature within 1 year. An additional $36.2 billion was to mature in 1 to 5 years.

On June 30 of this year, the debt is expected to total $285 billion. The average maturity of the marketable debt is now 4 years and 8 months, or 8 months shorter than when Mr. Eisenhower took over—and the Treasury is fighting to hold it there. Of the $285 billion, $76 billion will mature within 1 year. An additional $58.2 billion will come due in 1 to 5 years.

The Treasury insists it hasn't slipped backward quite so much when it comes to bank versus nonbank financing. On June 30, 1953, commercial banks held $58.8 billion, or 22 percent of the $266 billion. As of February 28, 1959, commercial banks held $66 billion of the outstanding total of $285.2 billion, or 24 percent.

TIGHT MONEY LIKELY TO GET TIGHTER

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

Now that the House Ways and Means Committee has pigeonholed for the balance of this session legislation permitting the Treasury Department to issue Government bonds with an interest coupon higher than 4¼ percent, business analysts are trying to figure the consequent effects on business activity and the credit market.

Their analysis must start out with the fact that short-term credit is very tight. Small business borrowers are beginning to complain that their bankers are "pretty well loaded up," meaning a bank's ratio of loans to deposits is just about as high as the banker wants to see it go. And, as a generality, it may be noted that this ratio for the total of all the commercial banks at the end of July was at a high level.

It is against this current status of the banking system that business analysts have to project conditions, which must include a normal seasonal increase in the demand for bank credit between now and the end of the year, to finance harvests, Christmas inventories, and the higher rate of business activity that usually develops in the fall and winter.

On top of the already tight situation, plus the rising seasonal needs for short-term credit, we now have to superimpose the credit needs of the Federal Government. The latter is being forced to borrow in competition with business for the available supply of credit in the short-term and intermediate-term markets. Thus simple arithmetic strongly suggests that the present tight credit situation threatens to become extremely tight over the next several months.

The failure of Congress to give the Treasury Department more flexibility in solving its financing and refinancing problems is going to place a considerable penalty on legitimate business borrowers, large and small—but, as usual, more severely on the small rather than the large.

All of which presents some very difficult problems for the monetary authorities at the Federal Reserve. One of their primary responsibilities is to exercise credit controls in a fashion that will prevent an inflationary abuse of credit. In the past year they have been discharging that responsibility with excellent results and without retarding sound business expansion.

That reminds us that another primary function of the monetary authorities is to provide the economy with a bank credit base that will be sufficient to permit sound economic expansion. There probably is no group of men in the country that is more anxious to see a rising trend of business activity, providing, of course, that the prosperity does not contain those excesses which cause a boom-and-bust pattern.

It appears that the monetary authorities in the next several months must try to find a very delicate solution for a set of unusually rough problems. It would seem that they will have to ease credit policies to a sufficient extent to prevent the extreme tightness now indicated for the fourth quarter of the year, or else the soundly expanding economy might be threatened by a deficient supply of credit. Simultaneously, the Treasury Department's demands for credit will have to be handled in such fashion as to prevent an inflationary expansion of money supply, or we will be threatened with the development of a boom-and-bust pattern.

From a security market viewpoint, when credit is this tight it certainly is not bullish, and usually it is the reverse. The condition means: (1) that there are less funds readily available for buying securities, (2) it leads toward an increase in the relative yield attraction of bonds over stocks, and (3) it could have a dampening effect on business activity. In most earlier cycles, this combination has frequently led to downswings in both the trend of business and the trend of stock prices.

But in none of these earlier instances were the nonfinancial economic forces operating as strongly in the direction of sustained business activity as they are now. In those earlier instances, the tightness of the credit situation reflected the presence of an overexpanded economy and an abusive use of credit. The nonfinancial economic factors were set for a downswing to a much greater extent than they are now. Present indications suggest quite strongly that there will be a good snapback of business activity when present work stoppages are terminated. As a corollary, fourth-quarter earnings of a great many companies promise to be excellent.

In brief, the money situation is bearish, so far as common stocks are concerned, and the business situation is bullish. It was because the money situation had been bullish in the presence of a fairly severe inflation scare that high price-to-earnings ratios and low yields have been recorded in the stock market, especially for "quality" stocks and some of the extremely speculative issues. It is because the business and earnings situation for numerous cyclical groups of companies had been bearish that some of the stocks in this category do not appear to be high in relation to the earnings and dividend improvement now indicated by business prospects.

DANGER OF RECESSION SEEN AS MONEY BECOMES TIGHTER

If the president of the Chase National Bank is correct, major corporations will be paying at 5 percent for short-term bank loans this fall.

Some time this fall, the Federal Reserve is expected to hike the discount rate to 4 percent.

This will mean that the prime rate—the metropolitan banks' interest charge to the top corporations—will rise by at least a half percent from today's 4.5 percent level.

When this takes place, interest rates will be higher than at any time since the twenties. If they come—and the probability is that they will—these moves will be made in the name of fighting inflation.

Money is once again getting tight, and is expected to become still tighter. Already, the U.S. Treasury is paying 4.75 percent on 1-year notes because of lack of takers for long-term bonds which have a legal interest ceiling of 4.25 percent.

Because of this successful short-term refinancing operation of the Treasury, the immediate heat to remove the bond interest ceiling has been permitted to cool off. Nevertheless, the Treasury is continuing its drive for removal of the bond interest ceiling.

After a conference with Secretary of the Treasury Anderson, the House Ways and Means Committee last month agreed to remove from a proposed bill the interest ceiling, a "sense of Congress" resolution calling upon the Federal Reserve to hold down interest rates by lending moderate support to the Federal bond market.

The Federal Reserve and Treasury had fought this resolution on the grounds that such support for the bond market is inflationary. However, present short-term financing being practiced by the Treasury is considered by monetary experts to be far more inflationary in its impact than FRB support of the bond market. Short-term Treasury bills and notes have been called "kissin' cousins" to printing press money by many of these experts.

With tighter money, interest charges will rise still further and credit terms will become stiffer. This will mean fewer mortgage loans as well as higher interest charges for home buyers, less credit at greater cost to consumers and, inevitably, more bankruptcies for small business because of lack of credit.

Charges that administration-FRB monetary policies are leading to another recession are once again being raised upon the floor of Congress. Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT, Democrat, of California, demanded in one such address last month that there be a fullfledged congressional investigation of the Federal Reserve to determine if its tight-money policies are in the best interests of the Nation.

The California Congressman noted that joblessness is still high and said that "policies that further restrict economic growth can cause unemployment to snowball."

BUSINESS UPTURN LOSING ZIP, SAY BUYING AGENTS—SLOWING UPTREND IN OUTPUT AND ORDERS CONTINUED IN AUGUST, GROUP REPORTS—PRODUCTION IS "STILL GOOD"

NEW YORK.—While current business remains good and its relatively unaffected by the steel strike so far, the upturn from the 1958 recession "continues to lose its zip," according to a survey of purchasing agents.

Fewer of the men who buy for the Nation's top commercial and industrial concerns reported increases for August in production, new orders, inventories and employment than they did in July. Although the strikes in the steel and copper industries play a major part in this slowing of the uptrend, the survey, made monthly by the National Association of Purchasing Agents, noted that the slackening in the number of reporting rises in output and order receipts has been rather sharp since May. The steel strike began in mid-July; the copper walkouts started in August.

The general strike in the steel industry has had "very little effect" on 73 percent of the members answering the survey, while only 4 percent reported considerable impact. The report noted, however, that if the strike continues another month, it will bring sharper cutbacks in output.

While terming production figures "still good," the association said 31 percent of its members reported increases in output in August, down from 35 percent in July and as much as 60 percent in May. Orders also were still strong with 31 percent of the members reporting increases in August compared with 36 percent in July and 53 percent in May.

"Inventories, particularly of steel, tend to be lower than in previous months," the report stated. For the first time since last January, fewer members reported gains in inventories than declines. Of those reporting, 28 percent said their stockpiles fell in August, up from 16 percent in July, while 22 percent told of increases, down from 45 percent.

The association also said it had received "alarming" reports of "critical shortages" developing in naphthalene and anhydrides. Naphthalene is a byproduct of coke production, a preliminary phase in the making of steel, and phthalic and maleic anhydrides are made from it.

Prices were generally steady in August, the association said, and again the steel strike and its ultimate settlement play large roles. "Steel will set the pattern" of future price movements, the group stated. For August, 76 percent of the members said there had been no change in prices, up from 68 percent in July, while 23 percent told of small increases, compared with 25 percent the month before.

On employment, 63 percent of the reporting members said there was no change in their work forces between July and August. Still, only 26 percent reported improvement, exactly half the 52 percent so reporting the month before.

The report concluded with the observation that the recession-induced opposition to accumulating heavy inventories is continuing. "There is no evidence that strikes, temporary shortages, or the influx of lower priced imports have occasioned any change in this policy," it said.

Following is a comparison of delivery periods for purchases in August and July, 1959:

	Percent reporting
	Immediate	30 days	60 days	90 days	6 months-1 year
August:
Production materials	10	26	32	21	11
Maint., repair, pprtg., supplies	22	52	19	6	1
Capital expenditures	9	5	13	20	53
July:
Production materials	5	28	33	24	10
Maint., repair, pprtg., supply	21	49	19	8	3
Capital expenditures	10	7	10	24	49

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief comment; then I shall be finished. I desired to cast my vote in favor of the administration's recent proposal to increase the interest rate to 3¾ percent on savings bonds E and H. I did not join with my colleagues who sought to establish a ceiling of 4¼ percent on savings bonds. I did not do so for a specific reason. By increasing the interest rate to 4¼ percent on E and H savings bonds we are surely laying a trap for ourselves in the months ahead on long-term bonds. We will certainly be faced with the prospect of raising to 5 or 5½ percent the interest rates on long-term bonds at tremendous cost to the taxpayer. That is one of the reasons why I could not go along with my colleageus on this side of the aisle on the Anderson amendment.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE EDMUND P. RADWAN

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it is with a heavy heart that I report to the Senate the death of one of my former colleagues in the House of Representatives, the Honorable Edmund P. Radwan. He passed away last night and the news has come as a great shock to his many friends.

Ed was a Buffalonian in every way. He was born in Buffalo in 1911, was graduated from the University of Buffalo, and had practiced law in that city since 1935. Following service in World War II, he was elected to the New York State Senate, and in 1950 he was elected to the House of Representatives.

He served in the House of Representatives through the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses, before he was forced to retire because of ill health. He was a good friend and loyal supporter, with whom I enjoyed serving.

We stood shoulder to shoulder on many occasions on matters of mutual concern. He represented his district well and he always stood up for their interests with great integrity and skill. He served with special distinction on the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Ed Radwan was an able and conscientious legislator who exemplified the finest in public service. His retirement from Congress was a great loss to the House, and his death at this early age is a great loss to all who knew him.

His removal from our midst comes with special poignancy because he is survived by his wonderful wife and three daughters. They have my deepest sympathy, and I trust they can find some solace in knowing how highly all of us who were privileged to know Ed Radwan regarded him and how greatly he will be missed not only in Buffalo, but throughout New York State and Washington.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that we do not expect any further votes this evening. We shall keep the Senate in session as long as necessary to accommodate individual Senators who have been so considerate as to withhold their speeches until we could have the yea-and-nay votes we have had this evening.

Early tomorrow we expect to act on the housing bill. We have already passed the housing bill twice this session and have voted on a veto once. The other body must act on the housing bill we passed, and it will probably go to conference before we adjourn. Therefore I shall move to consider the housing bill tonight and make it the unfinished business.

The Senate will meet tomorrow for a morning hour at 9:30, which will be followed by a calendar call. At the conclusion of the calendar call there will be brief statements on the housing bill. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] informs me that his statement on the bill will be quite brief. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] feels that it will not take him too long to discuss the measure. The other members of the Banking and Currency Committee may wish to make brief statements. We hope to pass the housing bill sometime early tomorrow.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, have conferees been named on the bill concerning the interest rate on series E and H U.S. savings bonds, which we passed today?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Louisiana that no conferees have been named.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I am hopeful the House will accept the Senate bill, but if the House does not, it seems to me we should consider the fact that the Senate added a very significant amendment. That amendment applied a ceiling to interest rates in compliance with the traditional history of this country on the amount of interest which could be paid on the bonds. I refer to the Anderson amendment.

I note that not a single senior Member of the Senate on either side of the aisle voted for the Anderson amendment. This issue has come up before and it has been discussed.

It seems to me the majority of the conferees should express the majority will of the Senate if this measure goes to conference. I raise the question now because it is very important to the people of the country. The rules of the Senate require that the conferees who are named on behalf of the Senate should be Senators who will vote the will of the Senate. At least the majority of the conferees should be among those who so voted.

I went into a conference sometime ago as a minority member of the conference who had voted the will of the Senate, and I saw a Senator move to surrender the Senate position, even before the House conferees had been officially named.

I believe that when the Senate adopts amendments the Senate should follow the rules and see that the position taken by the Senate is represented by a majority of the conferees. I wish to make that position clear, Mr. President. I do not wish to obstruct the Senate, but I feel that if the House does not accept the Senate bill, the Senate conferees should represent the majority will of the Senate, as the rules require.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is there not an order for the Senate to recess until 9:30 tomorrow morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order has been entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It will be in order tomorrow, following the morning hour, to move to proceed to executive business at any time, will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order at any time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is not necessary to have an adjournment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, the able and fine Senator from Louisiana has just made a remark about the conferees. I do not know who is to be appointed on the conference. I assume the conferees are appointed according to seniority. The junior Senator from Delaware may be one so appointed, and I wish to remind the Senator from Louisiana of the perseverence with which some of the Members of the Senate stood by an amendment on which he was one of the conferees not too long ago. I hope he will not level against the junior Senator from Delaware the charge which I think he was attempting to make.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, if the junior Senator from Louisiana had anything to say about it, we would build a pedestal in Washington for the junior Senator from Delaware.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce that the Appropriations Committee is meeting on the mutual security bill downstairs, and its members should return to it as soon as possible.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 952, S. 2654.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2654) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

THE AMERICAN SMALL TOWN

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I rise today to speak a strong word of encouragement and support for a great and almost unprecedented and unparalleled institution known as the American small town. The term "small town," Mr. President, is a relative one. In the metropolitan east I have frequently heard communities upward of 50,000 people referred to as a small town, whereas in the rural States of America we sometimes refer to communities of less than 1,500 people as being "one of the biggest little cities in the world."

However, for purposes of the bill which I introduced on August 31 to establish a Commission on Problems of Small Towns, I proposed that a small town be designated as one having a population of less than 10,000 people in the last census. This Commission would, therefore, concentrate upon recommending solutions for communities of 10,000 or less, but it is obvious the suggested solutions and formulas of activity would be equally useful to many of our smaller cities ranging up to 50,000 or more in population.

Mr. President, I have been impressed as I have traveled abroad on three separate occasions on trips taking me into all countries of Europe, and parts of Africa, Asia, and the Western Hemisphere, by the fact that an American small town, whatever its size, is something unique in the world in which we live.

Especially is this so outside the English-speaking countries of the world. One finds cities, Mr. President, throughout the world to be pretty much alike. Each has its churches and cathedrals, each its educational institutions, each its beautiful public buildings and its lovely homes. Each has its theaters, its recreational places, its broad boulevards, its hustle and bustle and its crowded streets. Each also, unfortunately, has its areas of squalor and crime. But in traveling abroad, one finds that virtually only in America and a few other English-speaking areas of the world is there an institution such as our typical small town where one finds in a compact area many of the advantages and few of the disadvantages of life in any city in the world.

Our American small town has its well-staffed public schools, its convenient and comfortable churches, its business enterprises, its city hall, its recreational advantages. Our American small town maintains with pride a high school, a football and basketball team, a semipro baseball team, a marching band, and a fire department. Our American small town brings together the advantages of life in the country with the cozy neighborliness of a life in a community where one can belong to his Kiwanis or Rotary Club, his chamber of commerce, his church and lodge, in company with friends of his own choosing and with people who estimate the character of a man by what he is rather than by what he has.

One searches in vain, for example, in the smaller communities of other areas of the world for anything remotely resembling the civic clubs, commercial clubs, or chamber of commerce groups of a small American town. One looks without success for the rivalry and stimulating experience of competition among American small towns for laurels in the fields of athletics, forensics, musical productions, and civic progress. The hospitals, the homes for the aged, the armories, or community halls of our small towns are also entirely unique among the communities of the non-English speaking world.

Mr. President, on August 31 I introduced my bill to create a Commission to be known as the Commission on the Problems of Small Towns. Since then I have been both gratified and encouraged by the widespread support developing for this proposal. This would be a temporary Government Commission, Mr. President, comprised of 18 members to be appointed on the general formula used in selecting members of the Hoover Commission. It would make its report in a year or 18 months. It would serve without pay or without remuneration beyond expenses. It would be comprised of leaders in the areas where small towns exist and operate. It would deal exclusively with problems which no other Government commission has been created to analyze and study—the unique problems of our small American towns. It would report to Congress and the country with suggestions on how small towns can help themselves and how through cooperation with the Federal Government the Government in Washington could help small towns. This assistance through cooperative effort, Mr. President, would not be one of direct financial assistance or Federal grants, but it could well come from more appropriate consideration by the Federal Government of the importance of our small towns through a wider dispersal of Federal procurement and in the location of Federal facilities. In fact, S. 2621 sets out in section 3 six specific areas in which such a Commission might benefit small towns.

Mr. President, we have had many commissions created or proposed to study the problems involved in big government; the problems of our metropolitan areas; farm problems; labor problems; educational problems, and the like. But no agency of Government, no research department, no commission of the Congress has been charged with the responsibility of finding facts and making recommendations of value to America's small towns.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CURTIS. What proportion of the people who live in towns and cities live in small towns as defined by the Senator's bill?

Mr. MUNDT. The proportion of people who live in small towns and cities is very great. The proportion of Americans living in communities of this size or less is well over 50 percent.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that much of the attention on the part of the Federal Government has been directed toward the problems of the large cities having congestion and related problems, as contrasted with the problems faced by the great number of small towns to which the Senator from South Dakota refers?

Mr. MUNDT. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska is correct. All kinds of studies and all kinds of research projects have been conducted concerning the problems of the major metropolitan areas, but I have made careful research and have been unable to find that any other commission has made an overall study of the small towns.

The Senator realizes that in his great State of Nebraska, as in South Dakota, small towns play an important part in the economy of the various States.

Throughout history, Mr. President, the American small town has made magnificent and lasting contributions to the development of our American way of life. The existence of small towns has helped to contribute the necessary balances to check against the extremes and excesses in one direction or another which have plagued or destroyed other governments and countries. The small towns of America have been a great bastion for producing the freedoms of Americans at home and for preserving the great institutions of private ownership and competitive enterprise which have teamed up to make America great and to keep it strong.

Mr. President, more than 200 Members of the present House of Representatives and over half our sitting Senators were born in America's small towns. Twenty-eight of the 33 men who have been elevated to the highest office in the world—the Presidency of the United States—were born in these small towns. The annals of business and industry and the records of achievement in the professions are replete with evidence that America's small towns cradle and nourish many of our greatest leaders and most outstanding citizens.

However, Mr. President, just as changing times and the technical and industrial developments forming a part of America's march of progess have created problems in our cities, on our farms, in our industrial relationships, and in government, they have also created new challenges and new problems for America's small towns. Great transcontinental trunk highways have made it easier for people to bypass American small towns and move from one metropolitan center to another, without stopping to enjoy the inspiration and friendliness always available in these communities. The tendency of business institutions to become more concentrated in administration and greater in size has created new problems for the individual merchants and economic enterprises of America's small towns. Advancing costs of education, of government, of police protection, of communication, and transportation have all added to the problems of the progressive people of America's small towns. The switch of passenger and freight transportation away from railroads has necessitated the elimination of many railroad services, and the tremendous costs of adequate airport facilities have made them prohibitive for our small towns.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2621, the measure I have introduced, to create a Commission on the Problems of Small Towns, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2621) introduced by Mr. MUNDT on August 31, 1959, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the small towns of America throughout our history have made significant and lasting contributions to the development of our American way of life; and

Whereas small town life as we know it in the United States is virtually a unique form of community living entirely nonexistent in many areas of the world; and

Whereas the continuance of our great complex of small towns is both desirable and essential to the economic, social, and political balance which enables the United States to avoid the extremes which have plagued many other governments and countries; and

Whereas wholesome family life, and adequate economic, educational and spiritual opportunity are nurtured and encouraged by thousands of small towns throughout the country; and

Whereas the march of technical and industrial development has produced changes in transportation facilities, patterns of economic activity, shifts in population, and other modern phenomena which have created new challenges and posed new problems to the progressive people living in America's small towns; and

Whereas small towns lack the research facilities and economic means to instigate constructive and comprehensive studies into the exact causes of their problems and the most productive remedies for them: Now, therefore

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COMMISSION

SECTION 1. There is hereby established a Commission to be known as the Commission on the Problems of Small Towns (a small town being designated as having a population of less than ten thousand) hereinafter referred to as the "Commission".

MEMBERSHIP OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 2 (a) The Commission shall be composed of eighteen members as follows:

(1) Six appointed from the Senate by the President of the Senate, three from the majority party and three from the minority party;

(1) the present and prospective needs of the Nation's smalltown areas for public services, including but not limited to planning, highways, water resources, schools, recreation facilities, prevention of juvenile delinquency, municipal financing, and business expansion, including ways and means to induce new business to smalltown areas;

Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission, or any duly designated member, and may be served by any person designated by such Chairman or member. The provisions of sections 102 to 104, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes (2 U.S.C. 192–194), shall apply in the case of any failure of any witness to comply with any subpena or to testify when summoned under authority of this section.

(b) The Commission is authorized to secure from any department, agency, or independent instrumentality of the executive branch of the Government any information it deems necessary to carry out its functions under this Act; and each such department, agency, and instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman, or the Vice Chairman when acting as Chairman.

APPROPRIATIONS, EXPENSES, AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 5. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

(b) Members of the Commission shall receive no compensation for their services as such, but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of duties vested in the Commission.

(c) The Commission may appoint and fix the compensation of such employees as it deems advisable without regard to the provisions of the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended.

(d) The Commission may procure, by contract or otherwise, the services of public or private organizations or institutions.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, on the other hand, the march of industrial and technical advancement has not always been in conflict with the interests and growth and convenience of living of our small towns. Here families can be raised free from the temptations, the turmoil, and the disillusionments of life in the big city. Through air transportation, today a person can live in a remote small town in a rural area and, within a few hours' time, be visiting in a city, to enjoy its theaters, its opera, or its symphonies. The main street merchant or professional man can leave home in the morning, fly to a city, enjoy a big-league baseball game, and be home that evening. Television brings to those who live in our small towns the same public information panels, newscasts, dramatic programs, and high-grade entertainment that are available to people who live in the swank apartments of Chicago or in the plush apartments and hotels of New York City's Park Avenue.

AMERICA'S SMALL TOWNS ARE NOT RETREATING

In addition, Mr. President, no one should get the notion that America's small towns are on the retreat. Our small towns are here to stay. Our small towns are here to grow. While some have faltered and failed temporarily, others have made tremendous and gratifying advances. While some remain in status quo and neither expand nor increase in size, others have steadily forged ahead. Every State has its examples of small towns of equal size, where there is an apparent equality of economic opportunity; but some demonstrate that with the proper ingredients of vision, leadership, and financial support, they attain sustained and successful growth, while other towns within the same State apparently lack "that certain something" to get started with a new upsurge of growth.

What are those ingredients? What is it that enables some small towns within a State to succeed and to progress, while others apparently are falling back and are failing to resolve their problems? It is hoped, Mr. President, that the proposed Government Commission on the Problems of Small Towns will come up with reports and recommendations which will enable all of our smaller American communities to do successfully what some of them are doing presently; namely, to analyze their opportunities, reappraise their advantages, create new enterprise, attract more people and capital, and move forward into eras of happier living and more prosperous economic activity. In that connection, this Commission would be expected to develop recommendations of value to the community leaders and other citizens of our small towns.

One thing is clear, Mr. President: Small towns necessarily lack the expensive research facilities and the economic means to make these essential studies for themselves. In order to determine the exact cause of the problems confronting the fine Americans who live in our smaller communities, and to come up with the most helpful and productive remedies for solving them, some governmental commission, similar to the one I have proposed, seems to be essential. In an era when we are spending billions of dollars to help others in virtually every foreign country of the world to help themselves to move forward and upward, I think it highly appropriate to utilize the time and talent necessary to help identify and eliminate the specific problems confronting those who live in America's small towns and to help these sturdy citizens to develop new techniques, new formulas, and new approaches which will enable them to do for themselves the essential things required to protect their identities and to promote their future.

Actually, of course, the cost of a commission such as the one I propose would be highly insignificant, since the 18 members to be appointed by the President would serve without pay. However, its dividends could be very great. The commission would call upon experts in the fields of economics, sociology, education, industrial expansion, public administration, and associated functions, who would dedicate their studies and devote their efforts in helping to provide recommendations of value to the small towns which desire to perpetuate themselves and get ahead.

Mr. President, the small towns of America are big business to the United States. Let me cite a statistic or two to prove the point that the protection, perpetuation, and development of our small towns are of vital importance to all Americans. According to the 1950 national census, 51 percent of all our people lived in localities of 10,000 or less—as I indicated a few moments ago, in my response to a question which was asked me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS]. Of the total number of 4,741 localities counted in that census, 73 percent, or 3,479, had 10,000 or less inhabitants. It follows clearly that anything that helps the growth, prosperity, stability, and the preservation of America's small towns as integral and healthy segments of our body politic is of significance to the country as a whole. As it is said of freedom, therefore, it can be said of America's small towns: The solution of their problems is everybody's business. America's small towns not only are big business in this country; their continued development is good business for all America.

Mr. President, I hopefully recommend to the consideration of the Senate the approval of my bill, S. 2621, to create a Commission on the Problems of America's Small Towns.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS SERIOUSLY THREATENED BY FOREIGN COMPETITION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, there is no one whom I personally love more than I do my dear friend, the Senator from Minnesota. But I have been seeking the floor all day; and, in view of the circumstances in which I find myself, I must ask the Senator from Minnesota to wait until my brief remarks on a matter of great moment are completed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is only because of the charitable nature of my soul that I accede to the demand of the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Let me ask my dear friend, the Senator from Minnesota, how much time he will need.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; Mr. President; I ask the Senator from New York please to proceed.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] I introduced, for appropriate reference, a bill to equalize the conditions of competition between domestic industries and foreign industries, with respect to the level of wages and the working conditions involved in the production of articles imported into the United States. I ask that this bill be printed at the end of my remarks, and that it lie on the table until Friday, September 11, in order that interested Members of the Senate may indicate their desire to cosponsor this measure.

Mr. President, I recognize full well that this bill will not be actively considered by the Senate, or by an appropriate committee, until the next session of Congress. Nevertheless, I believe there are a number of real advantages to introducing this bill at the present time. The problem with which this bill is concerned is highly complex, and, needless to say, very controversial. A good many of us recognize the need to take action that will deal effectively and fairly with the difficulties confronting American manufacturers faced with competition from manufacturers abroad whose labor costs are one-tenth of the prevailing American wages in the same industry. While many of us realize that some sort of appropriate action should be taken by the United States on behalf of American industries faced with this situation, there is very little agreement as to the most feasible and effective approach to this problem.

The bill which we are introducing today is intended to center attention on this vital problem. It represents what I believe to be a unique and little discussed approach to this dilemma. It is introduced at this particular time in the hope that, in the intervening months between now and January, considerable study and discussion will be undertaken by individuals and groups interested in this problem. Furthermore, it is hoped that this proposal will stimulate additional proposals, and in this way will result in a useful and careful analysis of the various possible alternative solutions.

Mr. President I should like briefly to analyse the problem with which this bill is concerned. Through the great and protracted efforts of many Americans in the late decades of the 19th century and the early decades of the 20th century, sweatshop labor conditions in the United States have been largely eliminated. This is a fact of which every American can be justifiably proud.

In the years since there was enacted in the country legislation prohibiting sweatshop labor conditions, foreign trade has expanded greatly. The result is that foreign industries wherein wages are low and labor conditions are unsatisfactory now compete actively with American industries in which such conditions are specifically prohibited. For example, if an employer in another country pays only 15 cents or 20 cents or 25 cents an hour in wages, he has a very significant advantage over his American counterpart, who must pay more than one dollar an hour, under the Federal law, and who, in most cases, as all of us know, pays considerably more than the one dollar an hour minimum wage. This is especially true if the foreign manufacturer also enjoys more lenient laws regarding labor conditions. By labor conditions, I refer to such matters as hours, work days per week, age of employees, and required hygienic facilities.

It is evident that the American manufacturer who is forced to compete under these circumstances is at a great disadvantage. This is especially true if, in his particular industry, wages represent a large part of the total production cost, as in the case of the manufacture of garments, cloth, sporting equipment, novelty items, toys, and certain small appliances. In such cases, the American manufacturer is, in a way, forced to subsidize the substandard conditions abroad in light of the fact that such conditions are illegal in the United States.

I recognize full well the great problems which any action to remedy this situation automatically create for American foreign policy. I recognize, too, the importance of American trade for every country of the free world. In this connection, I certainly agree that we must move cautiously and deliberately in this matter.

Mr. President, this proposed legislation is, I believe, a worthwhile step in the direction of a tenable solution to this problem. I hope that the recess period and the session to come will be marked by further steps in this direction on the part of the Congress and of all interested parties in this country, and, for that matter, on the part of all interested parties abroad.

The basic purpose of this bill is to establish the principle in the law that the differential in wages and working conditions between this Nation and a foreign competitor should be taken into account in America's foreign trade regulations and policies. Under the bill, this principle would be applied in all those cases in which such a differential is a major factor in the decline or threatened decline of an established American industry.

The procedures established in this bill provide that either the President or Congress can initiate action in those cases in which competition on the part of foreign industries, wherein low wages and substandard labor conditions prevail, seriously threatens domestic producers in the same industry. In addition, the representatives of an affected industry or of a union in an affected industry can file a petition for relief. Since it is the differences in labor costs and labor conditions which are the bases for action under this bill, it is through the Secretary of Labor that relief is obtained. The Secretary or his designee is empowered, upon an appropriate request or petition, to carry out a thorough investigation of any situation in which it is held that the differential in labor costs and conditions allows foreign producers to seriously threaten their American counterparts.

Mr. President, it is my opinion that the competitive conditions which are crucial to this legislation, namely, labor costs and conditions, can be determined and appraised on an objective basis. Both wages and labor conditions under this bill are defined in terms of the requirements imposed upon domestic industries under fair labor standards and minimum wage and hour legislation and under other Federal and State laws regarding wages and labor conditions. It is, of course, expected that the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics would play an important role in the investigation process described above.

Once an investigation is completed, the Secretary shall then recommend a suitable adjustment for the inequalities in competitive conditions in any situation in which it is established that wages and labor costs are sufficiently unequal to warrant relief. The President would then have 60 days in which to disapprove of the Secretary's proposal if he felt that it would be unwise on the basis of overriding foreign policy considerations. If he did not disapprove, the Secretary's recommendation would then go into effect.

Mr. President, the legislative proposal described above was inspired by a meeting which I sponsored that was held in Washington several weeks ago. The meeting was attended by several of our colleagues and by representatives of the clothing industry and of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. All present were in agreement that the workers and employers in many sectors of the hard pressed garment industry are greatly in need of some sort of relief with regard to the serious threat posed by low-cost foreign imports. I personally came away from this meeting with the hope that serious and concentrated efforts on the part of Congress, the industry, and the unions involved, would produce a means by which suitable relief could be provided. Mr. President, I hope that this proposal, along with others which have already been made or are forthcoming, will stimulate constructive discussion and research, and will eventually result in an effective and tenable solution for this important problem.

Mr. President, I would be remiss in my obligations were I not to express my personal gratitude in the formulation of this proposed legislation for the aid extended to me by the counsel for the garment industry, particularly the men's clothing industry, and by the counsel of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, both of whom have been very helpful in the preparation of this bill. However, I want to stress the fact that this bill is not limited to any one industry.

I sincerely believe that the formula prescribed in this bill represents a partial answer to the problem to which this bill is addressed. Many of us who consistently have been strong supporters of the reciprocal trade principle, but who have found that over the years, as our imports have increased and our exports have declined, find that we now face a somewhat different situation from that which we faced when the Trade Agreements Act was enacted.

Let me make it clear that I intend to continue to be a supporter of reciprocal trade, because I recognize the necessity for us to import goods into this country, in order that we will, as a result, be able to pay for the goods which are exported from the United States. But the situation is considerably different at this time from what it was when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was first enacted. I am hopeful that the formula which is presented in this proposed legislation, or some modification of it, may form the basis for constructive action by Congress next year to meet the situation which presently confronts us with respect to the inroads made by foreign manufacturers into certain established American industries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, and held at the desk, as requested by the Senator from New York.

The bill (S. 2663) to provide for equalizing the conditions of competition between domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and the working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States, introduced by Mr. KEATING (for himself, Mr. BEALL, Mr. COTTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. BUSH, and Mr. SALTONSTALL), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding immediately following section 337 (unfair practices in import trade) the following new section:

"SEC. 337A 1. FINDINGS.—Sweatshop labor conditions in the United States are illegal and have been largely eliminated. However, the rapid expansion of American foreign trade in recent years, in effect, permits foreign industries in which substandard conditions exist to compete with American industries in which such practices are explicitly prohibited by law. As a result, many Amercan industries, especially those in which labor costs constitute a significant proportion of the total production cost, have been substantially damaged or are now threatened by such foreign competition. The following procedures are designed to provide relief for American industries which, while being prohibited by law from establishing sweatshop labor conditions, are threatened with extinction by foreign industries in which labor conditions (judged on the bases specified in the United States Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938) are substandard.

"2. PROCEDURES.—(a) Upon the request of the President, upon resolution of either House of Congress, or upon application of the representative of any domestic industry or employee organization adversely affected by imports of articles produced in any low-wage country or countries, the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter referred to as the 'Secretary') or his designee shall promptly make an investigation of any situation in which it appears that the differential in total labor costs allows foreign producers to take advantage of unequal competitive conditions in the light of the requirements imposed upon domestic industries under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 and other Federal and State laws.

"(b) Should the Secretary find, as a result of his investigation, and upon examination of all relevant factors, that the labor cost differential in any such case should be equalized in order to afford relief to the domestic industry, he shall specify and declare such new or additional duty or duties as he shall determine will offset the disadvantage in competition with respect to the specified country or countries; and effective the day after date of issuance of an order to that effect there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles enumerated in such order when imported into the United States from any such foreign country or countries such new or additional duty. Any such new or additional duty shall be put into effect provisionally and shall become finally effective 60 days after the date it provisionally goes into effect unless within such 60 days the President disapproves the action of the Secretary for reasons of overriding foreign policy considerations.

"(c) In determining whether the representative of any domestic industry or employee organization is qualified to make application under the provisions of this section the Secretary shall consider, among other factors, the standards of living in competing countries as measured by wages and the purchasing power of those wages in the light of the standards specified in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

"(d) A report shall be made and published upon the disposition of each request, application, or resolution under this section. The Secretary shall publish procedural regulations to give effect to the authority conferred upon him hereunder.

"(e) After investigation, finding, and declaration in the manner provided in the case of an order issued pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, any order or provision thereof may be suspended or terminated by the Secretary whenever he finds and declares that the circumstances requiring the order or provision thereof no longer exist or may be modified by the Secretary whenever he finds and declares that changed circumstances require such modification to carry out the purposes of this section."

SEC. 2. This Act shall enter into force as soon as practicable, on a date to be specified by the President in a notice to the Secretary of the Treasury following such negotiations as may be necessary to effect a modification or termination of any international obligations of the United States with which the amendment might conflict, but in any event not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today the Senate considered the interest rate on series E and H U.S. savings bonds and acted favorably upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

I voted for that amendment because I thought it was in the public interest, and because I felt it safeguarded the monetary and fiscal policy of our country, and represented a most constructive and salutary measure.

Mr. President, Tuesday the First National City Bank of New York raised its prime rate from 4½ percent to 5 percent. As my colleagues know, the prime rate is the fee which commercial banks charge to their biggest borrowers and those with the best credit ratings.

This act by the First National City Bank in New York touched off a wave of similar rate increases throughout the Nation. The newspapers tell the story and it is one which will affect directly and indirectly all of our people.

The Wall Street Journal has a headline story entitled: "Prime Rate Is Raised to 5 Percent From 4½ Percent by Major Banks—Key Short-Term Money Rates Up One-Quarter to Three-Eighth Point." And in a subhead it is reported: "Prime Rate Highest Since 1931—Heavy Loan Demand, Shortage of Funds Cited."

Another article from the Wall Street Journal has the following headline: "Treasury Issues Drop to New Lows Following Boost in Prime Rate"; "U.S. Bonds Offer Highest Average Yield Since 1932—Top-Grade Corporates Ease."

On the same page there is another article headed "Record U.S. Debt Passes $290 Billion, Still Rising." And the lead paragraph reads:

> Uncle Sam is deeper in debt than ever before in history, and is due to go even further in debt before the year is out.

I invite the attention of my colleagues to another story from the Wall Street Journal, entitled "Installment Credit Rise in July Was Biggest in 4 Years—Adjusted Gain of $500 Million Pushed Consumer Debt to Record $36.4 Billion."

I repeat, Mr. President, installment credit stands at more than $36.4 billion, an alltime record high, nearly $3.4 billion above the amount outstanding a year ago. When this administration came into office, installment credit was $19.4 billion. It has virtually doubled in a period of less than 7 years.

As a result of the administration's tight money policies, we see more and more of the American people's incomes going into payment of interest as a result of soaring interest rates to which I have referred. No single expenditure of the American people has risen as sharply under this administration as has the cost of borrowing money. And unfortunately, all signs point to the indisputable conclusion that interest rates are going to go even higher.

As the articles to which I have referred point out, the prime interest rate is now at the highest level since 1931, and Treasury issues are at the lowest point since 1932. This, of course, should come as no surprise to those who are familiar with the philosophy and the position of the GOP. It has clung stubbornly and tenaciously to the theory that tight money policies are in the best interest of the Nation, as being necessary to prevent inflation. The fact that this theory has been disproved in practice seems to make no impression on our good friends in the Republican Party.

During the period from the middle of 1954 until 1957, when interest rates were steadily rising due to the deliberate restriction in the supply of money, the administration argued that this was necessary in order to hold down the cost of living. Yet the record clearly shows that during this period prices did not remain stable, but they rose steadily and increasingly to new record highs. In 1956 and 1957, as a matter of fact, the rise in prices was one of the greatest in any peacetime period in our Nation's history.

Yet, the administration persists in its position that we must have a credit squeeze, in the meantime the interest rates are soaring and soaring. It will not be long until we see money rates reach the level which was established when Andrew Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury.

The fact of the matter is that the inflation which we have been experiencing in recent years under this administration has not been due to an excess supply of money. Quite the contrary. As my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Wisconsin, has pointed out, the supply of money in relation to the gross national product has in fact been declining in recent years and is now at the lowest level since the 1920's.

The most authoritative member of the Senate on the subject of monetary policy, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], has said that we are not in a period where there is an excess supply of money in relation to demand for goods and services. The rise in the cost of living is due rather to factors such as administered prices which are now being considered by the Joint Economic Committee under the able chairmanship of the senior Senator from Illinois.

This administration has argued that we cannot afford wage increases and that we should not raise the minimum wage because this will be inflationary. It tells us that we should not have firm farm price supports, and it argues that such supports contribute to inflation. But for some strange reason, the administration feels that increases in the cost of borrowing money, by some unusual manner of reasoning, are not inflationary. As a matter of fact, our Republican logicians argue that raising the price of money is actually anti-inflationary.

It has never ceased to amaze me, Mr. President, how vigorously this administration opposes proposals to benefit those less fortunate members of our society at the bottom of the economic ladder, while it is ever ready to lend a helping hand to those at the top. When we propose raising the minimum wage law, the administration says "No." When we propose public housing for low income families, the administration says "No." When we propose a program to provide housing for the elderly, the administration says "No." When we propose realistic farm price support programs for the family farmers, the administration says "No." But when it comes to the question of raising interest rates, which will directly benefit the wealthy segment of our society, the administration eagerly presses for approval.

It is time the American people who borrow money to buy a home, or to buy a car, or to buy furnishings, or to meet doctor bills, or to attempt to start a small business, realize just how much they are paying in the form of interest and who is responsible for the sharp and seemingly never-ending rise in the cost of money.

I have spoken out on this issue many times before. As a matter of fact, I called attention in 1953 to the inherent dangers of the administration's tight-money policy and what it would mean to America. I intend to continue to call the attention of the American people to what is involved in the administration's tight-money policies and to show how it affects each and everyone of us.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles from the Wall Street Journal of September 2 to which I have referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

I also ask unanimous consent that the following articles from the Washington Post of September 2 be printed at this point in the RECORD: "U.S. Debt Tops $290 Billion"; "Installment Debt Reaches Alltime High"; "Prime Bank Rates Increased to 5 Percent"; "Stocks Tumble on Prime Rate Increase—U.S. Bonds Hit New Low."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal]

PRIME RATE IS RAISED TO 5 PERCENT FROM 4½ PERCENT BY MAJOR BANKS—KEY SHORT-TERM MONEY RATES UP ONE-FOURTH TO THREE-EIGHTHS POINT—PRIME RATE HIGHEST SINCE 1931—HEAVY LOAN DEMAND, SHORTAGE OF FUNDS CITED

Business borrowing costs surged upward along a broad front yesterday at First National City Bank of New York touched off a one-half percentage-point increase in the prime rate—the basic bank lending charge.

First National City raised the prime rate early yesterday to 5 percent from the 4½-percent rate which had been in effect since mid-May. The prime rate is the fee commercial banks charge for loans to their biggest borrowers with the best credit ratings. Other lending rates are scaled upward from the prime rate. The new rate is the highest in 28 years.

The move by the big New York City bank sparked these quick reactions:

A number of leading banks in New York City and in other major cities across the country promptly followed First National City's lead. Other banks which did not immediately follow the increase were expected to announce similar rate boosts soon.

SHORT-TERM RATES ALSO RISE

Key short-term money rates—bankers' acceptances and commercial paper—moved up by one-fourth percentage point to three-eights point. These increases followed another rise in yields on U.S. Treasury bills Monday. Treasury bills, whose yields climbed to the highest level in 26 years for the second week in a row, compete with bankers' acceptances and commercial paper for short-term investment funds.

A number of New York City banks also raised the lending rates to brokers and dealers for purchasing or carrying non-Government securities. This rate moved to 5 percent from 4½ percent early yesterday along with the prime rate.

The latest prime rate increase prompted speculation the Federal Reserve System might soon increase the discount rate—the fee charged member commercial banks on loans from the System. The discount rate was raised to its current 3½ percent from 3 percent in late May, about a week after the last prime rate boost.

Indications in Washington have been that the Federal Reserve would like to wait until the steel strike is settled before approving a higher discount rate. However, commercial banks, charging 5 percent to their customers, now will have an unusually wide spread between what they charge their customers and the 3½ percent rate they pay to borrow from the Federal Reserve.

Also, the rates on 13-week Treasury bills have been well above the 3½ percent discount rate for the past 2 weeks. The latest issue Treasury bills, for instance, sold Monday at a 3.889 percent yield, up from 3.824 percent a week earlier. The Federal Reserve prefers to keep the discount rate at or above the yields on Treasury bills to discourage banks from borrowing from the System at a lower rate in order to make a profit on the higher-yielding bills.

BOOST IS NO SURPRISE

The prime rate boost was not a surprise since banks have been squeezed between increasing demand for loans to businesses and a growing shortage of loanable funds. In addition, sagging bond prices in recent weeks have forced banks to take heavier losses on any sales of Government securities to raise money to lend, causing the banks to be reluctant to make such sales.

A prime rate change is traditionally started by a large New York City bank since out-of-town banks are usually reluctant to boost the rate for fear of driving away some of their bigger customers. The last previous prime rate change in May also was initiated by First National City.

Banks outside New York City were quick to join the trend to the 5 percent prime rate yesterday. Nearly all the Nation's largest commercial banks said they were following First National City's move.

One reason: Loan volume has been rising at a faster rate in many money centers outside New York than among the banking giants in New York itself. In the past year, for example, the total of commercial and industrial loans outstanding at New York City banks has increased 4 percent. But the increase in the same period has been 15 percent among west coast banks and 10 percent in the southeastern States. "This [rate increase] is overdue," commented Harold W. Scott, senior vice president of First Pennsylvania Banking & Trust Co. in Philadelphia. "If New York and Chicago [banks] had been affected by this loan demand the way we have, it would have happened 6 weeks ago."

And bankers in New York and elsewhere expect seasonal factors, such as credit needs to move crops to market and to stock up merchandise inventories for fall and Christmas business, to push up loan demand for the rest of the year. A possible settlement of the steel strike in coming weeks would give added impetus to a borrowing surge.

The Federal Reserve System, since early spring, has been tightening up on the amount of money banks have to lend, in line with the System's present policy of countering any inflationary tendencies in the economy.

The amount of money banks can lend is governed by their reserves—the percentage of deposits member banks are required to keep on deposit at Federal Reserve banks. On a given day some banks may have reserves that exceed their legal requirements while other banks may have to borrow from Federal Reserve banks to meet reserve requirements.

When total borrowings are greater than total excess reserves, it means the banking system as a whole has gone into debt to Federal Reserve banks to make some loans. Commercial banks as a whole this summer have been in debt to the System an average of $500 million, with borrowings (over and above excess reserves of some banks) reaching nearly $1 billion at times.

HIGHEST RATE SINCE 1931
